displacement," Lobisser said. "Quite minimal displacement actually, based on the nature of the construction."

The changes, with the exception of an Erb Essentials remodel, are focused primarily on the east wing of the EMU, which was built in the early 1970s. The committee proposed changes to the ramp behind the current transportation kiosk. In addition, a new kiosk would be formed near the north entrance to serve as a focal point for enhanced entry to the EMU. It would have EMU and transportation-information and provide campus tours.

The members of the board seemed eager to make tangible improvements to the area and EMU. The board debated setting a list of priorities to ensure that base improvements are made.

Board member Ethan Firpo spoke about the east wing in particular. "Who knows when we'll get the money to do the master plan," Firpo said. "Whatever we can do to improve that horrid pit, the better we are."

Also during Wednesday's meeting, members of the Student Conduct Code Committee presented the Senate with its first round of proposed revisions to the conduct code, which is being comprehensively revamped for the first time in several decades.

"The big change is jurisdiction," Committee co-Chairman Jesse Harding said.

The current code gives the University off-campus jurisdiction to discipline students only if sexual assault or misconduct occurs. The revised code will expand jurisdiction to allow the University to discipline students through the conduct process for any act of physical violence or threat of violence against another student that causes a reasonable person fear of physical harm.

Director of Student Judicial Affairs Chris Loschiavo said this type of expansion of jurisdiction has worked on other campuses, and as far as he knows, the University has the legal authority to do this because there is no case law prohibiting it.

He added that the conduct process is intended to be educational rather than punitive, and will in no way take the place of criminal prosecution that occurs as a result of a student's actions.

The committee also revised the code's mission statement to encompass more of a community aspect, and it revised the section on the authority for student discipline.

The University Senate also voted to reduce the number of credits required for fulfillment of University group requirements from 16 to 15 credits.

University Undergraduate Council Chairwoman Deborah Baumgold said this change was needed "to smooth the path for students coming from community colleges to the University," because classes at those colleges are usually worth three credits each rather than four. Baumgold said this leads to a problem when community college students come to the University because even though they took five courses at three credits each, they still would not meet the University group requirement for 16 credits, which a regular student could meet in only four classes.
