Students gathered outside the ASUO office at around 5:30 p.m. Monday to find out the ASUO general election results. Adam Petkun and Mena Ravassipour won the top spots.

ELECTION

ASUO Elections spokesman Nathan Strauss said PSST's success will probably spur more party-affiliated candidates in the future.

"I think it took a lot of candidates by surprise this year," Strauss said. "I think next year people will be a little more prepared and there will be more than one slate."

Elections are not yet finished, however. Because of a DuckWeb error during the primary election for Student Senate Seats 10, 12 and 14, the results were thrown out. Seats 10 and 12 were decided in the general election, but Seat 14 will require a special election to determine a winner. Moreno-Villamar and Spencer Hardy will compete in that election, which begins at 9 a.m. Wednesday and continues until 5 p.m. Friday.

Strauss said he expects an especially low voter turnout for that election because there are only two candidates running in the election.

ASUO Elections Coordinator Stephanie Day said it's more difficult for candidates because they must campaign specifically to social science majors, "compared to anybody that walks by."

Day said the elections board is planning to do what it can to help the candidates.

Strauss said the elections board has not developed a plan to raise awareness about the special election.

"I think the elections board will probably meet (today) and figure out what we want to do to promote this special election," he said.
