Hot cocoa is a favorite for children, but adults are crazy about it too. As the weather turns colder, many college students turn to Eugene's baristas for solace and a twist on this classic winter drink.

Any customer can customize their hot coco, but its knowing how to make it that turns a simple drink into an addictive creation.

At Dutch Bros., barista Kellie Gallagher said she and her fellow employees will accommodate any request for hot chocolate variations. Mexican hot chocolate is a popular pick at the shop, but Gallagher has her own favorite.

"I like extra-hot, mint hot chocolate — with lots of whip cream," Gallagher said.

The baristas at the 11th Avenue and High Street Dutch Bros. use the company's brand of chocolate milk. The baristas said the "Children's Not So Hot" hot chocolate, is a top seller this time of year.

Starbucks, which has multiple locations in Eugene including their shop on East 13th Avenue makes its hot cocoa with vanilla crème or caramel.

New Odyssey Juice and Java, located on 10th Avenue and Willamette Street, uses Ghirardelli chocolate. Barista Walt Hunts was quick to share his knowledge of hot cocoa.

"The quality of chocolate and the quality of the milk" are what matters most in hot cocoa, he said. He added that powders are better to use because they are more stable than syrup.

The most requested hot cocoa drink at New Odyssey is the regular hot chocolate with whip, but the chocolate can be white, cherry or raspberry. It also carries variations of the drink, such as Mexican or crème of coconut.

Mexican hot cocoa with a bit of cinnamon is a favorite of Espresso Roma barista Salvador Delatorre.
