After outbreak, researchers plan immunization study

PORTLAND — After a recent outbreak of whooping cough cases in Douglas County, researchers from Oregon Health & Science University are planning a study on childhood immunizations in rural regions of the state.

The study will examine rural clinicians' approaches to immunization services, methods for tracking immunizations and barriers to timely immunizations for children.

L.J. Fagnan, the director of the Oregon Rural Practice-based Research Network at OHSU said there is no current system in place to immunize a community quickly when there is an outbreak, like the whooping cough in Douglas County.

About 1,200 rural doctors in Oregon have already been asked to provide their current immunization practices, and results of that survey are expected in early spring.

Researchers said the survey will be used to address gaps that exist in childhood immunization coordination, tracking and delivery.
