■ In my opinion

Oregon has plenty of problems, but players lack viable solutions

After each of Oregon's three Pacific-10 Conference losses this season, the Ducks have uttered the same excuses for what went wrong.

"We need to get off to a faster start," Aaron Brooks said after the Ducks lost to UCLA.

"We need to match our opponent's intensity," Bryce Taylor said after Oregon lost to Washington.

It was Arizona 74, Oregon 66 Thursday at McArthur Court, and the Ducks' post-game answers were no different.

But as Brooks' interview was ending after Thursday's loss, he was presented with a different question.

What does Oregon have to do to fix these problems?

"I don't know," Brooks replied.

While the sophomore point guard's response sounds like a clueless youngster admitting a lack of understanding, his answer actually sums up Oregon's problems perfectly.

There are a lot of things the Ducks don't understand.

There are no seniors on the Oregon roster. The Ducks' best offensive players are all under the age of 21. They have three freshmen who see significant playing time, and their best veteran player, Ian Crosswhite, has committed 16 turnovers in the last three games.
