Corps: Volunteers live at level of community development, agriculture, environment, business development, information technology and health and HIV/AIDS education.

Volunteers are paid for their work at a living allowance that allows them to live at the same level as the people in the community they are serving in.

"The stipend is roughly equal to the basic standard of living in that country," Schrock said.

They also receive a total of 48 vacation days. Volunteers receive $6,000 to help them transition back into life in the United States.

Volunteers must be at least 18 years old, although the average age of volunteers is 29, and 97 percent of current volunteers have at least an undergraduate degree. Without a degree, volunteers must have significant work experience in a specific area.

Serving in the Peace Corps is often a good transition for students who are between undergraduate and graduate schools, or between school and a career. Schrock said the Peace Corps is also a good stepping stone for those interested in international studies.

Students interested in joining the Peace Corps after graduation should begin the application process the end of their junior year or the beginning of their senior year because the process takes six to 12 months from the time the application is submitted until the time when training begins.

Schrock will hold an informational meeting open to all students on Thursday at 6 p.m. in the EMU International Lounge.
