PFC: Some will perform old duties under new director title

Some groups, like the ASUO Women's Center, have as many as nine directors and a programming budget of only about $22,000.

Although the new system eliminates stipend positions for group treasurers, vice presidents and other leaders, people can now perform those duties under the title of director up to the maximum number of directors a group can have.

Creighton-Neiwert previously said about $289,000 of the PFC budget goes toward stipends.

University President Dave Frohnmayer prompted the initial stipend changes this summer when he noted some groups received more money for stipends than programming.

Sherman said he favored the new model.

"I think it really gets at the heart of volunteerism in (student groups)," he said.

PFC Chairwoman Persis Pohowala said Monday that rising health care costs have created some of the spending problems.

Creighton-Neiwert said her calculations of health care cost increases may be slightly inaccurate because she hasn't been able to meet with every group.

"I could have easily missed something," she said. "You get the sense that this is a ballpark figure."

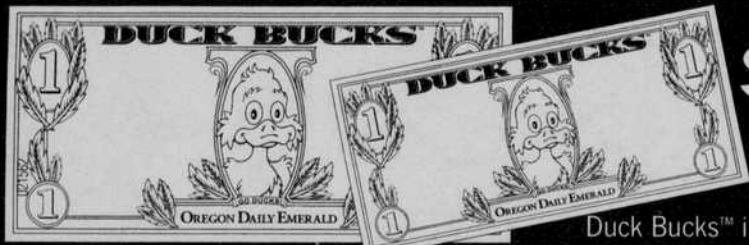

PFC member Khanh Le said he was concerned that paying leaders in the form of a scholarship might affect students' financial aid packages.

But Creighton-Neiwert said scholarships will not affect the overall amount of aid a student receives.

The PFC previously considered several methods to reduce its spending, including giving every group a 2 percent decrease and approving the executive recommendation for all groups.

The PFC process has been delayed by injunctions placed against three of its members and other difficulties, causing the Senate to extend the committee's deadline until Monday.
