School: Reputation, money spent considered

Bean said. "It's a score in a game that we don't generally play."

There are several business programs that Bean said he is especially proud of.

"The one that's most highly ranked is the Warsaw Sports Business Center," Bean said. "We also have an excellent center in entrepreneurship. Our finance and marketing departments have recently been ranked very highly."

Still, there are some concerns about U.S. News & World Report's ranking system.

"It fills a need in that students and people across the country need a way to sort out all the options that they have," Bean said. He added that the ranking system is based on a single formula that will be better for some schools and worse for others.

"Its objective function and ours don't line up very well," he said.

Rankings take into account the amount of money spent per student and the school's reputation among professionals and academics. The study examines ratings for placement success, quality, faculty resources and selectivity in a number of ways.

"Rankings should always be judged on the basis of the evaluation criteria that were used," Sugai of the education school said. "In our case, special education faculty have generated a significant proportion of the research and training dollars at the University of Oregon."

He said the school's ability to leverage federal dollars for its work has been phenomenal, especially in the context of limited local resources. Sugai added that the Special Education program's high ranking is due in large part to the success of the program's faculty.

The Oregon Health & Science University, with which the University intends to establish a partnership by fall term 2006, also scored highly in the survey. The Portland-based university tied for 35th place among medical schools with a score of 51 out of 100. U.S. News & World Report ranked OHSU third in the nation for primary care, and the university had the third-best reputation among medical school deans and senior faculty for family medicine.
