Korea Night: KSA employs humor to draw audience

Cho said the display of traditional Korean culture is hard to get across, so KSA members decided to use humor in the show to draw the audience in.

University junior business major Jung Hee Shin, who played the Jing, a traditional Korean drum, said the drum performers practiced three times a week since fall term for the segment. The drum performers, who didn't know how to play their instruments before the fall, performed well and produced what she said was the audience's favorite segment of the program.

Shin didn't even like Korean music before she began practicing the traditional Korean rhythms. Now, she appreciates the power of the music and the teamwork required to make it, she said.

"I didn't really like Korean music. I thought it was really just noisy," she said. "But now it's harmony."

Eugene resident Vincent Kwon, who donated to Korea Night, said the drum segment and the fan dance were his favorite segments of the evening. He said he understands the difficulty of drumming at a constant rate for that long.

"It's a strong effort by a lot of college students who don't have much time," Kwon said. "So you've really got to take your hat off to that."
