Softball: Turning two requires trust

plays and know our strengths and weaknesses."

Sabol adds that knowing each other's tendencies helps with the team's defense.

"I know what she can get to and I know what I can get to," she said. "I know that even if a ball is hit to me and I can't see her or the base I can trust her to be there and just throw it and she feels the same way."

"We have trust in one another."

That trust is evident in the smooth, effortless way they are able to turn two.

But each has her favorite part of what Goodell calls an "art."

"My favorite part is turning it when the runner is sliding into you," Goodell said. "It makes it much more intense."

Sabol said she would rather make the play and make a good toss to Goodell.

"I really don't like it when runners are coming at me too much," Sabol said with a smile. "When they try to take you out and you still turn it, it is a good feeling too."

"As long as it doesn't hurt."

One thing they do agree on is not to take every mistake too seriously.

Last weekend against Oregon State, Sabol fielded a ball in the hole and fired it over the first baseman's head into the dugout, almost knocking over an Oregon State coach.

"At first (Sabol) looked like she was going to be upset, but I couldn't help but bust up laughing," Goodell said. "Then she laughs and it just lightens things up a little bit and helps her out too, so she's not down on herself."

But Sabol admits there are times when laughter isn't the best remedy.

"We know when not to make fun of each other too, because there are times when you are really upset," she said.

More often than not, the pair are making the plays and have contributed a considerable amount defensively for the Ducks over the past three seasons.

Not to mention they've been the pitcher's best friend.
