IN BRIEF

Divisi places second at international finals

Divisi, the University's female a cappella group, took second place in the International Finals for the International Championship of Collegiate A Cappella in New York City on Saturday night. Divisi also won an award for outstanding choreography. Six groups from different regions of the United States competed at the event, according to the ICCA Web site.

"We're very pleased with our performance," Divisi member Katie Hopkins said. She added that two out of the three judges placed Divisi first, and that about 100 of the group's friends and family members traveled to New York to watch the show. The group comprises 11 women.

Divisi's next major event, besides regular Friday shows at 4 p.m. in the EMU amphitheater, will be a benefit concert with On The Rocks, the University's male a cappella group, at 7 p.m. Saturday in Beall Hall. Proceeds from the event will go toward the Fanconi Anemia Research Fund and cancer treatment for local woman Miekka Hopps.

Galbraith: World Bank and Cheney sources of problems

The World Bank and the International Monetary Fund were created in the 1940s. The World Bank makes loans and guarantees credit to member countries while the IMF supplies money to help countries overcome short-term financial difficulties, according to the Global Exchange Web site.

Galbraith said the World Bank's information does not reveal the same global inequality rankings compared to his information, which he said is a more accurate portrayal of the global economy's current state.

Galbraith said economists too often rely on the erroneous assumption that countries choose their own development paths and have a say in the evolution of their equality, something he said is "fundamentally misleading."

He said an examination of the rise and fall of equality around the world when using quality data reveals an obvious correlation between world events and the state of the global economy.

"There are waves of events which affect regimes," Galbraith said. "This isn't rocket science."

Galbraith pointed to the fact that there is "no stabilizing anchor" in the international system as being a "predominant, compelling factor" in the increase of inequality around the globe.

Galbraith said countries in need of financial assistance are being forced to fight for that assistance at the expense of other needy countries, a problem that could be alleviated with the existence of a global monetary fund.

But Galbraith said accomplishing such a task may not be something the World Bank can do.

"I don't think it can be done by an organization which has been dominated by creditors ... as the World Bank is," Galbraith said, eliciting a round of applause from audience members.

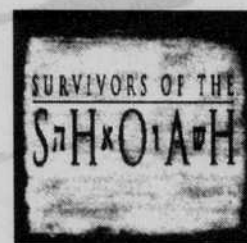

During a question and answer session, Galbraith discussed current U.S. foreign policy and criticized Vice President Dick Cheney for failing to understand the long-term implications of the United States financing security for the entire world.

Galbraith said Cheney seems to be subscribing to the theory that controlling the world's assets will lead to control of the world. He also suggested another possible reason why the Bush administration is trying to control the world's assets: "The other possibility is they don't know what they're doing."
