

Graduation: Problems arise from overlooked requirements

According to the Office of the Registrar, undergraduate seniors who intend to graduate this spring should have already applied for their degrees.

"The deadline to apply has passed," Sandra Lee, a student records specialist with the registrar's office, said. Bachelor's degree candidates are required to apply for degrees by Sunday of the fourth week of classes for the term in which they intend to graduate. Candidates for advanced degrees must file their applications by the end of the second week.

Lee added that students who missed the deadline but still hope to obtain a degree in the spring can file a petition with the registrar's office. Any student whose petition is denied will have to wait until the end of summer term to receive his or her degree.

However, a student can still participate in commencement, even if he or she won't be receiving a degree yet.

"Technically, the graduation ceremony is reserved for people who are graduating," Lee said. "But students often show up and participate."

According to the Office of Student Life's Web site, if a student hasn't filed for a degree, his or her name won't appear in the program for the general ceremony.

Representatives from the registrar's office and academic advising office said students should review their degree audit on DuckWeb before graduation to ensure all degree requirements are complete.

Academic adviser Carolyn Moravek said most problems arise because students overlook a general education requirement.

Bookstore sells graduation regalia for bachelor's candidates and rent materials for master's and doctoral candidates. A representative said the bookstore can't guarantee that robes and degree frames will stay in stock, so it's best to purchase graduation supplies as early as possible. A $10 late charge applies to regalia purchased after May 13.

Iraq: Students disagree over Carr's rhetoric students with a pro-war perspective.

"Because of personal politics, I disagree with Carr," Rosove said. "I completely respect his opinion, but it seemed too idealistic."

"It didn't seem that the real nuts and bolts were being presented, but (the speech) was incredibly valuable."

Freshman Jason Visenberg, a business administration student, said the speech was moving.

"I wasn't necessarily opposed to the war in Iraq," Visenberg said. "For all the bad, good things are being done."

Carr said he looks forward to a day when the nation will be a "free and pluralistic country."

"What a tremendous victory for humanity and decency," Carr said. "The terrorists know that if we win in Iraq, their way of life is doomed."
