Yom Kippur: Students try to balance religion, school from school.

"Last year was OK because Yom Kippur was on a Saturday," Rothstein said. "This year I'm missing a quiz and all sorts of stuff. I worked it out with my professors, and most of them were understanding, but in FHS, there's all sorts of projects. It's Rothstein isn't alone in her struggle. University undergraduate student Sara Raposo said she was going to try fasting this year for Yom Kippur, but because of her busy school schedule she won't be able to attend services.

"Before college, it wasn't as difficult to balance school and Yom Kippur," Raposo said. "It's a lot more difficult now, and there's a big difference in the workload. I have a lot of homework this week and a paper due on Friday."

Ben David, President of Oregon Hillel's Student Leadership Board and Judaic/Religious studies major, said while finding balance can be difficult, he struggles less than others.

"Studying religion, my faith and academics overlap a lot," David said. 'It gives me a good chance to question my spirituality and find a nice balance between my Jewish community and my academic community."

Contact the people, culture and faith reporter at bmcclenahan@dailyemerald.com

www.dailyemerald.com

Senate: New conduct code on the horizon

When the original draft was released it "instantly became a source of a lot of controversy both on campus and off campus," Keyes said.

The draft called for diversity training workshops for faculty members and suggested promotions be based on "cultural competency," causing many professors to write to University President Dave Frohnmayer, denouncing the plan as "Orwellian" and "frightening."

A University Senate ad hoc committee reviewed the plan in May and discussed possibilities for changes in the way the plan is put together. The committee will be involved in the review of the new draft as it comes closer to fruition, Keyes said.

Keyes emphasized the need to focus on the principles behind the diversity plan rather than just the details.

Another topic on the Senate's plate is the Student Conduct Code. The conduct code has been in a "slow but steady" revision process for about 10 years and is nearing completion, Keyes said. Final revisions should be presented to the Senate in January.

In the past, Senators had been given copies of revised policies at the beginning of a meeting, "then you're supposed to look it over quickly and have an intelligent conversation and vote on it in 20 minutes, and it just didn't work," Keyes said.

But a vote on the new conduct code will not take place until March, Keyes said, giving Senators plenty of time to review it and form educated opinions.

Military research has sparked debate on campus and a Senate ad hoc committee will form to examine the issue and seek out major concerns, Keves said.

University Vice President for Research and Graduate Studies Rich Linton has already expressed his support for such a committee, Keyes said.

Senate Vice President and finance instructor Jeanne Wagenknecht briefed Senators on the Oregon University System's new policy regarding sexual harassment, saying "we're ready to sort of put this issue to bed, for lack of a better metaphor." The policy mandates that, among other things, faculty members who are in romantic relationships with students they supervise must report the relationship immediately; arrangements can then be made to remove the student from their supervision.

University Senior Vice President and

Provost John Moseley briefed the Senate and said the funding crisis that has plagued Oregon universities is showing signs of letting up.

"We've been in a budget hole and the state's been digging the hole deeper and deeper," Moseley said. But the state has "stopped digging" and may be putting some dirt back into the hole,

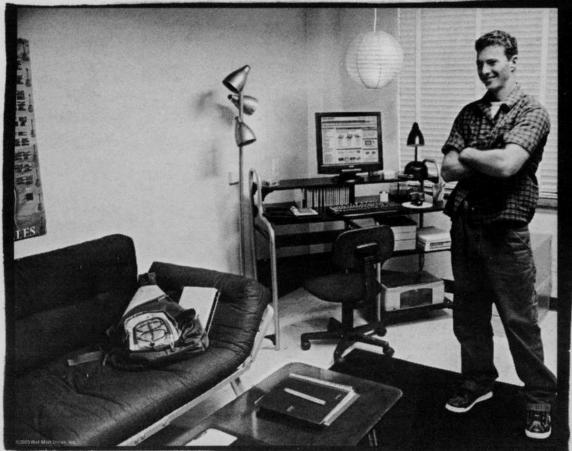

> Contact the news editor at mcuniff@dailyemerald.com

KATE HORTON | PHOTOGRAPHER

At the first meeting of the year Wednesday, University Senate President Peter Keyes discusses diversity-related issues the senate will review in upcoming meetings.

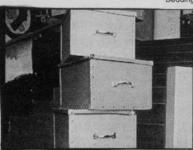

Share your space, but live on your own.

All furnishings pictured are from

WAL*MART