University of Oregon vs. Arizona

Running Back Jonathan Stewart

Each time Terrence Whitehead dons the Oregon uniform and plays well it comes with the realization that only four more games remain before his illustrious Oregon career ends and promising tailback Jonathan Stewart takes over.

Whitehead and Stewart have bonded as the younger tailback has gained insight into everything relating to college football. It has helped.

Stewart, after missing two games with an ankle injury suffered against Montana, has returned with a flourish, scoring two rushing touchdowns and catching a third in his first game back against Stanford. He followed that gem with 34 yards rushing on nine carries against host Arizona State in an Oregon 31-17 win.

Feeling healthier against Washington, Stewart returned two kickoffs for 69 yards, including a 36-yarder. The most impressive part of his performance, which included 26 yards on six carries, was a 17-yard run in the third quarter along the right sideline for a touchdown.

His play this season isn't the only reason people are high on the Washington native. His high school résumé helped, including being Washington's all-time leading rusher and considered by ESPN.com as the No. 2 prep recruit in the nation for his recruiting class.

Maybe it was fitting that Stewart had his initial ESPN highlight on a run that required multiple defenders to pull him down in Oregon's season opener. Focusing on this season and most importantly the next game against Arizona, the Oregon running attack, including Whitehead and Stewart, should have plenty of opportunities. Arizona allows an average of 199.2 rushing yards per game and has allowed 11 rushing touchdowns.

Running Back Mike Bell

Mike Bell has been a workhorse this season. Bell has twice come close to posting 1,000-yard seasons in his career. In 2003 and 2004 he broke the 900-yard mark and is on pace to earn his first 1,000-yard season this year.

Last week against Stanford, Bell rushed for 88 net yards and one touchdown in Arizona's 20-16 loss. His 88 yards moved him into the top five for all-time rushers in school history, totaling 2,661 career yards on 584 attempts — 20 less carries than Arizona's all-time leading tailback Trung Candidate, who amassed 3,824 yards from 1996-99. Bell has managed to lead the team in rushing yards for three consecutive years.

Bell's numbers this season are not indicative of his talent. He has explosive speed in the open field, but has had trouble breaking through defenses in light of Arizona's porous offensive line. Bell also poses a threat as a receiver. He is known to run quick routes in short-yardage situations stretching for first downs. He posted 136 receiving yards as a freshman in 2002.

Bell has made an impact for Arizona since his freshman year, when then-head coach John Mackovic moved him from being a redshirt to sharing snaps at tailback. He is best remembered for running circles around Arizona State's defense en route to 139 rushing yards in last year's 34-27 upset over the Sun Devils.

Against Oregon, Bell was held to 65 rushing yards last season and 54 the season before.

Arizona's best chance to win this season is to put the ball in Bell's hands and watch excitement happen. Bell is making his mark at Arizona, despite playing through several of the roughest years in the program's history.
