Diversity: Revised plan will seek student participation letter of protestation: physics professor Nilendra Deshpande and mathematics professor emeritus Richard Koch. The group is co-chaired by Suzanne Clark, an English professor, and psychology professor Gordon Hall.

"This effort is about having students be active participants in the process, and to me that's absolutely essential," he said.

The group has been meeting weekly since June to revise the plan.

The group includes a wide representation of constituents on campus, and it's important, too, to reflect diverse views on the previous plan," Martinez said.

Although the group originally intended to have the new plan ready in time for fall term, Martinez said the complexity and importance of the subject matter demanded the plan not be released until it is absolutely complete.

He added that he hopes campus and community members will give their opinions on the new plan after its release.

Martinez said much of the focus was on "providing definitions" and "implementation issues" that were lacking in the original draft.

Ten group members did not return the Emerald's calls and sociology professor Mia Tuan would not comment on the committee's work.

Martinez said he hopes students are still concerned with and thinking about the plan.

"I would want students to know, 'Stay tuned — this is coming,' and we really encourage participation in the discussion," he said.

IN BRIEF

Eugene Police consider new review process

The Eugene Police Commission will discuss Tuesday night's passage of the external police review ballot measure and consider the possible next steps at its meeting this evening.

The Police Commission recommended an external police review program to the City Council in July after more than 15 months of research. The recommendation called for an independent auditor to be hired by the City Council. The ballot measure authorizes the City Council to hire the auditor, a responsibility previously held by the city manager. The measure passed with 57 percent of the vote.

The council must now implement the plan recommended by the commission.

The commission will discuss the outcome of the election and what steps will be taken next at the meeting this evening.

"We're going to look at presenting a more concrete plan to the City Council and offer them any assistance we can," Police Commission Coordinator Jeannine Parisi said.

Though the review system is now in the hands of the City Council, Parisi is expecting the Police Commission to have a role.

"There's a ton of work to do," Parisi said. "The city council will want all the support it can get, it has a lot on its plate."

The Police Commission recommendation is being used as the starting point for discussions of a review system, and Parisi hopes the council will stay close to the commission's recommendations.

"The council has to make a decision on how to use the authority they've been given," Parisi said. "The Police Commission hopes it will be consistent with what the Police Commission proposed."

The meeting will be at 5:30 p.m. in the McNutt Room at Eugene City Hall at 777 Pearl St.
