IN BRIEF

Duck leader will represent team at upcoming NAAs

Finishing in the top 50 at the NCAA Championship cross country meet is a dream one Oregon runner could make a reality.

Junior Patrick Werhane will represent the Oregon team in the national meet this weekend.

"I was relieved when I heard I got the bid to go," Werhane said. "It could have gone either way, so I didn't want to get my hopes up. When I found out I was going, I was really excited. All my hard work has really paid off."

Late in the season Oregon's number one runner, Galen Rupp, was removed from racing because of a foot injury. This moved Werhane into the team's leadership position.

The NCAA Championships is arguably the toughest meet of the season, allowing elite collegiate runners across the nation to go head-to-head. To compete in the race, each runner must be selected by the NCAA to compete individually or on a qualifying team.

"I feel a little bit of pressure because I want to represent the University of Oregon well, but also I don't want to let my team down," Werhane said. "You really want to run well for the guys on my team."

Werhane will compete with more than 250 runners from 18 teams and 13 additional at-large teams at Saturday's race.

which includes an 0-28 record last season under sixth-year head coach Horace Broadnax.

Entering the season, Broadnax had amassed a 42-88 record at Savannah State.

The Tigers return one starter from last year's squad, 6-foot-2 guard Michael Bennett, who averaged 6.9 points per game.

Oregon, however, understands that the focus heading into Sunday's opener will primarily be on making the necessary adjustments.

"We definitely have some things we need to work out right now," forward Adam Zahn said. "Our competition is important, obviously, but we're focusing on getting ourselves where we need to be for the Pac-10 season."

Duck fans packing McArthur Court for the season opener will see many familiar faces but some recognizable differences for Oregon in addition to gained maturity from a team that started three freshmen last season.

"We're still a running team. We've got to get in transition. We definitely need that post presence, but (running is) still our game."

AARON BROOKS | Point guard

In recent years, Oregon's tendency has been to push the ball in order to utilize its speed in transition, resulting in easy buckets and opportunities for open perimeter shots.

The Ducks hoisted 170 shots from beyond the arc a year ago.

While the transition game again remains a focus with the return of talented guards like Brooks, an All-Pac-10 guard and Pac-10 All-Freshman performer Hairston and Bryce Taylor, newcomer Ivan Johnson and sophomore seven-footer Ray Schafer provided Oregon with viable low-post options in its two exhibition contests.

Splitting duties, Schafer and Johnson poured in a combined 44 points in the two games, while the Ducks shot an unusually low 20 total three-pointers.

"We're still a running team," Brooks said. "We've got to get in transition. We definitely need that post presence, but (running is) still our game."

Women: Transfers bring versatility to Ducks team the advantage."

Nevada has improved over last season, when the Wolfpack finished 8-22 and in 10th place in the Western Athletic Conference.

Sophomore guard Meghan McGuire averaged 13.2 points and made 32 three-pointers in 2004-05. In exhibition games against Bay Area Pro-Am and Sonoma State, McGuire scored 11 and 23 points, respectively.

Freshman newcomer Brandi Fitzgerald is a versatile player who can play point guard through the post positions. Evelina Janisyte is a 6-foot-5 community college transfer who can match the size of Shettlers.

Oregon will again be tested in the post after facing Temple's All-America candidate Candice Dupree last week.

Sabrina Keys, a 6-foot-2 forward, transferred from Purdue and is a physical player down low. She played sparingly for the Boilermakers and will gain more time at Nevada. She had 16 points and seven rebounds in Nevada's first exhibition game and 10 points the second. While she hasn't seen film yet, Davis said know Nevada is a trapping team and have been preparing for that in practice.
