Government to Assist

If plans formulated at the meeting of the Oregon Irrigation Congress in Portland last week are carried out, all future irrigation work in Oregon will be financed by bond issues and performed with the co-operation of the Federal Government. While there was considerable diversity of opinion as to the character of the security to back the bonds, the manner of their redemption and the methods for using the money when secured, the delegates were fully agreed that the credit of the state must be used and that full advan-age must be taken of the Government's offer of assistance. It was freely predicted that the Tamaso project, in Central Oregon, now in course of construction, will be the last irrigation work to be done by direct taxation in this state. Methods by which speculators may be eliminated from irrigated sections and lands and water rights sold only to men who will improve and live on their farms were discussed at length.

Most Profitable Type of Swine for Market

Oregon Agricultural College, Corvallis, Ore., Feb. 11.—"The general trend of the evolution of market swine is toward younger lighter weight and smoother animals," says Professor G. E. Sampson, of the Oregon Agricultural College Animal Husbandry department. "Since this is in line with the interests of the consumer as well as economy to the producer, there is little reason to expect it to be radically changed. The age of pigs affects not only the economy of gains but the quality of the carcass and consequent price as well. In the Portland market there is a difference of more than a cent a pound in favor of the 200 pound pig well fattened, over 110 lbs. "As a general practice it is well to put growing pigs through rapid gains, although there are two sides to the question. If the pig is crowded to this capacity he wastes a large proportion of the nutrients that he consumes, though his maintenance costs less in the aggregate, since he is kept a shorter period of time. Likewise the desirable high finish is not secured in pigs which make gains slowly, for the food is consumed in growth instead of fattening. Such animals do not bring the satisfactory price that is secured for plump, well finished porkers of smaller size."

The hogs are more profitable in Hood River Valley than fruit is the assertion of a rancher in that section who last year marketed 100 animals for which he received $2,755. Among the porkers disposed of was one weighing 720 pounds dressed, said to be the largest ever raised in that county.

Wat Tyler's Rebellion
Attempts to fix by statute the wages of agricultural laborers in England were largely responsible for the great revolt of 1381, or "Wat Tyler's rebellion." It represented the despairing effort of landowners to get back to the level of wages before the black death came to make labor dear. But the bid of the manor overbid the mark. He wanted the day wage kept down to 4 cents to 5 cents a day. Had he put 6 cents to 8 cents in the schedule there might have been no rebellion.

No Wonder.
Jack—Yes, your John may have had 250 turkeys, but his heart was on the right side. Wags—is it possible? No wonder he died.
He is nearest to God who has the fewest wants. (Watch Proverb)
