NATIONS NEW IDEAL OF PATRIOTISM

The late war has brought us a new ideal of Memorial Day. Services in memory of the dead have been held at some fixed season of the year by all peoples of all times and all religious beliefs. The growth of civilization, in fact could almost be traced through the evolution of these customs alone from the time when the ancients brought sacrifices and libations of food and wine to leave on the graves, to the present observances of many countries.

It was after the close of the Civil war that Memorial Day or Decoration Day as we love to call it, first became a great American holiday. A group of women of a Mississippi city went out on this day, when all the most beautiful flowers of the year were in bloom, to decorate the graves of their loved ones who had fallen in behalf of the "Lost Cause." Many of the Southern dead lay side by side with the enemy, but there were no enemy graves when they had finished, for all alike had been flower-strewn. When the story of this was spread abroad many Northern cities set apart a day a month later, when the flowers in the colder climates were beginning to bloom profusely, and went out and decorated all the graves of the soldier dead in their cemeteries.

One by one the state legislatures passed laws making Memorial Day (April 30 in some of the southern states) a legal holiday. To us it has become more familiar as a day on which the cemeteries are visited and the graves, not only of the Civil war veterans, but of all the dead, decorated than as an occasion for great patriotic gatherings.

Reminiscent of that first Memorial Day and the way in which it drew North and South together with the common bond of their dead between them is an incident of how this holiday was observed in France last year.

A great cemetery, where simple freshly-painted crosses row on row marked the sorried ranks of American sleepers, had been built up near a French village. The simple folk of this village, with their own beautiful but sad Jour des Morts, or annual day of praying for the souls of their dead, had heard that the next day was the day on which Americans honored their dead so they sent a request to the American consular not far away, asking doctors, nurses, canteen workers, and patients—all who could—to join them early on the following morning at the entrance to the cemetery just at the edge of the town.

The cannons in which the Americans would have gone were all pressed into emergency service, and when they finally arrived at the cemetery, it was late afternoon. The French came to meet them disappointed, thinking they had failed to make themselves understood. All the children of the village, they said, had arisen at daybreak and gone out into the fields and gathered dew-wet flowers until the graves of the Americans had been entirely covered from sight. When they had waited as long as they could, many of them went away sobbing that the flowers, which were already beginning to droop, could not have been beheld in all their freshness by those who had known and loved the sleepers.

Those same graves will be flower-strewn by loving hands this year and wet again with the tears of the simple folk who knew and loved our boys. But the Americans whose loved ones lie buried there will not spend the day in idle tears. For the ideals with which we went into the World War, and with which we saw it through, have become a new ideal of national life, of which we should be never so conscious as on Memorial Day. It has become to us not the day on which we mourn those who are with us no more, but rather the day on which we take thought of the great upflaming spirit of patriotism which led them into the conflict, until something of it becomes our spirit and we catch the vision to carry on.

It will come to us on Memorial Day that we good Americans are facing conflicts almost as grave as those they faced in the first lines over there, and we must gird ourselves up with courage. We have a thousand enemies which we must face insidiously. To sit down and weep now would be but to betray the bravery they have shown. We must fight the little tongues of revolutionary flame that are constantly darting up here and there; we must combat the restlessness, the discontent; we must fight the profiteers and the trade abuses; and we have equally to fight off old, reactionary tendencies toward slipping back into old, stagnated channels. And so this year, even more than last, Memorial Day will be a day on which we will consciously pledge ourselves anew to the ideals to which our boys, with all America went to war.

All over America there are to be gatherings together of men, women and children, as if all the communities of the country had heard the voices of the dead through the voice of Roosevelt, saying:

"If any friends or loved ones of ours wish to commemorate us after death, the way to do it is by some expression of good will to those who are still living."—Exchange.

Maxwell Prices
Reduced—Now $845

New Organization, Taking Full Control, Turns Prices Back Three Years

The last step in the Maxwell reorganization was the sale of the Maxwell properties to the new and powerful organization, May 12.

The first step of the new organization was to raise the value of the good Maxwell still higher, by restoring prices to the former low level of 1918.

The reduction is $150 on each of the four models, effective at once.

This is the second price revision made by the new organization; and the total reduction from the high level, since Sept. 28, 1920 has been $310 on open cars and $350 on closed cars.

The new organization now owns the great Maxwell plants outright. Its way is clear to carry out in full its larger plans and policies.

It pledges itself never to stop working for the further betterment of the good Maxwell, and for the greater satisfaction of present and future owners of this good car.
