

If You Want The Best.

ALTHOUGH you may have had good luck with a few failures in making cake and biscuit in the old-fashioned way with soda and sour milk, or soda and cream of tartar, you will have better luck and (following directions) no failures with the Royal Baking Powder.

The truth of this must be evident when you remember that in the leading hotels and restaurants, and in the homes of our city cousins, where the latest and best methods are invariably employed, and where the most beautiful and dainty food is always set out for the guests, the Royal Baking Powder is exclusively used for all quickly risen food.

Royal Baking Powder never disappoints; never makes sour, soggy or husky food; never spoils good materials; never leaves lumps of alkali in the biscuit or cake; while all these things do happen with the best of cooks who cling to the old-fashioned methods, or who use other baking powders.

If you want the best food, Royal Baking Powder is indispensable.

A Question That Troubles Literary People.

A crucial question is, "Typewriter, or no typewriter?" At a symposium on this subject, George Spinney, of the New York Times, said, "Typewriter copy is much the easier to edit." Ballard Smith, managing editor of The World, agreed that "typewriter copy is the only perfect copy to have." Richard Watson Gilder, of The Century, replied: "I much prefer typewritten copy. It is better for the eyes and more pacifying to the nerves." Mr. Carington, of Scribner's, although he admires the fine old Italian hand in vogue among the older authors, says that even a thoroughly legible hand and clear copy is not so welcome to the editor as a typewritten MS.

The Dramatic Development society of New York demands that all manuscripts submitted by its readers shall be typewritten by its own typewriter. Mrs. Mary Mapes Dodge, the editor of St. Nicholas, is reported to refuse all manuscripts except such as is typewritten. Kipling, although a most rapid writer with the pen, has been recently introduced to the machine and has knocked off some of his most telling verses with its aid.

Still, one can scarcely imagine Hawthorne pounding out "The Scarlet Letter" on the typewriter, or Keats pouring out "Endymion" to the clicking accompaniment of the noisy machine. Emily A. Thackeray in New York Knocks.

MY SUMMER GIRL.

How it came about I know not. She was merry—a dreamer. With never thought of aught at all excepting studios art. The story goes as usual—That the pretty little summer girl, With her arrows deftly pointed made a target of my heart.

I am not, as a rule, contented To be lured from "beach my skylight, But the outing days continued as the summer longer grew; And both of us with pleasure On dewy morn to twilight, And fall often somewhat later, winged their flight as hours do.

One morning in September She was standing on veranda. As I started for reflection in a walk along the shore. She said, "Before you go out On your usual meander Perhaps you'd like to know I'll be your summer girl no more."

I think I must have shown her That the news was far from pleasing, And she came a little nearer—near enough for me to see That her blue eyes were a twinkle With the ecstasy of teasing.

She whispered, "Why not ask me, too, your winter girl to be?" The answer I surrendered. Church and parson did their duty; And when she planned in my cravat a creamy jeweled tie!

She said, "It's not an emblem Of your own transcendent beauty, But just a small reminder that I'm your all season girl."

Unexpected Missive.
"Jane," said Mr. Skinnphint, a soft-eyed light shining in his eyes, "I think I have never given you anything for a Christmas present, have I?"

"No, William," answered Mrs. Skinnphint, "you never have."
"The Christmas, Jane," said Mr. Skinnphint in a voice trembling from unworried feeling, "shall be a different one from any we have ever had. What would you say to a present of some useful article for the house?"

"I would like it very much, William." "Something, for instance, that would be both useful and ornamental? Something that you could select yourself? How would that do?"

"Then, Jane," said Mr. Skinnphint, with an effort to retain his composure, "we need a new bookcase. Here is twenty-five cents to buy it with. If it costs less, Jane," he added in a broken voice, "you can keep the change."—Chicago Tribune.

IN SARK.

Abrast and ahead of the sea is a crag's front cloven assailed.
With strong sea breeze and with waisting of winds whene'er tor is shed.
As a shadow of death from the wings of the darkness on waters that thunder.
Abrast and ahead.

At its edge is a sepulcher hollowed and hewn for a lone man's bed.
Propped open with rock and agape on the sky and sea thereunder.
But roofed and walled in well from the wrath of them sleep its dead.

Here might not a man drink rapture of rest, or delight above wonder.
Beholding, a soul disembodied, the days and nights that feet.
With splendor and sound of the tempest around and above him and under.
Abrast and ahead.

ON THE BRIDGE.

When I tell you, my only friend, to whom I so rarely write and whom I more rarely see, that my lonely life has not been without love for woman, you will perhaps laugh or doubt.

"What!" you will say; "that gaunt old specter in his attic, with his books, his tobacco and his three flower pots? He would not know that there is such a word as love did he not encounter it now and then in his reading?"

True, I have divided my days between the books in a rich man's counting room and those in my attic. True, again, I have never been more than merely passable to look at, even in my best days.

Yet I have loved a woman.
During the five years when my elder brother lay in the hospital across the river, where he died, it was my custom to visit him every Sunday. I enjoyed the afternoon walk to the suburbs, where the air has more of nature in it, especially that portion of the walk which lay upon the bridge. More life than was usual upon the bridge moved there on Sunday. Then the cars were crowded with people seeking the parks. Many crossed on foot, stopping to look idly down at the dark and sluggish water.

One afternoon, as I stood thus leaning over the parapet, the sound of a woman's gentle laugh caused me to turn and occasionally inquire its source. The woman and a man were approaching. At the side of the woman walked soberly a handsome dog—a collie. There was that in their appearance and manner which plainly told me that here were husband and wife, of the middle class, intelligent but poor, out for a stroll. That they were quite devoted to each other was easily discernible.

The man looked about thirty years of age, was tall, slender and with neither strong nor handsome, but amiable face. He was doubtless a clerk fit to be something better.

The woman was perhaps twenty-four. She was not quite beautiful, yet she was more than pretty. She was of good size and figure; and the short plush coat that she wore, and the manner in which she kept her hands thrust in the pockets thereof, gave to her a dauntless air which the quiet and affectionate expression of her face softened.

She was a brunette, her eyes being large and distinctly dark, her face having that peculiar complexion which is most quickly affected by any change in health.

The color of her cheeks, the dark rim under her eyes, and other indefinable signs indicated some radical ailment. In the quick glance that I had of that pair, while the woman was smiling, a feeling of pity came over me. I have never detected the exact cause of that emotion. Perhaps in the woman's face I read the trace of past bodily and mental suffering; perhaps a subtle mark that death had already set there.

Neither the woman nor her husband noticed me as they passed. The dog regarded me cautiously with the corner of his eye. I probably would never have thought of the three again had I not seen them upon the bridge, under exactly the same circumstances, on the next Sunday.

So these young and then happy people walked here every Sunday, I thought. This, perhaps, was an event looked forward to throughout the week. The husband, doubtless, was kept a prisoner and slave at his desk from Monday morning until Saturday night, with respite only for eating and sleeping. Such cases are common, even with people who can think and who have some taste for luxury, and who are not devoid of love for the beautiful.

The sight of happiness which exists despite the cruelty of fate and man, and which is temporarily unconscious of its own liability to interruption and extinction, invariably fills me with sadness. And the sadness which arose at the contemplation of these two beings begat in me a strange sympathy for and interest in them.

On Sundays thereafter I would go early to the bridge and wait until they passed, for it proved that this was their habitual Sunday walk. Sometimes they would pause and join those who gazed down at the black river. I would, now and again, resume my journey toward the hospital while they thus stood, and I would look back from a distance. The bridge would then appear to me an abrupt ascent, rising to the dense city, and their two figures would stand out clearly against the background.

It became a matter of care to me to observe each Sunday whether the health of either had varied during the previous week. The husband, always pale and slight, showed little change, and that infrequently. But the fluctuations of the woman, as indicated by complexion, gait, expression and otherwise, were numerous and pronounced. Often she looked brighter and more robust than on the preceding Sunday. Her face would be then rounded out, and the dark crescents beneath her eyes would be less marked. Then I found myself elated.

But on the next Sunday the cheeks had receded slightly, the healthy luster of the eyes had given way to an ominous glow, the warning of death had returned. Then my heart would sink, and, sighing, I would murmur inaudibly: "This is one of the bad Sundays."

There came a time when every Sunday was a bad one.
Simply the unmistakable completeness and constancy of her devotion to her husband—the absorption of the woman in the wife! Had the strange ways of chance ever made known to her my feeling, and had she swerved from that devotion even to render me back love for love, then my own adoration for her would surely have departed.

Yes, I loved her—if I fill one's life with thoughts of a woman, if in fancy to see her face by day and night, if to have the will to die for her or to bear pain for her—if these and many more things mean love.

My richest joy was to see her content with her husband, and the darkest woe of my life was to anticipate the termination of their happiness.

So the Sundays passed. One afternoon I waited until almost dusk, yet the couple did not appear.

For seven Sundays in succession I did not meet them upon their wonted walk. On the eighth Sunday I saw the dog first, then the man. The latter was looking over the railing. The woman was not with him. Apprehensively I sought with my eyes his face. Much grief and loneliness were depicted there.

Was he or I the greater mourner? I wonder.
I suppose two years passed after that day ere I again beheld the widower—whose name I do not and probably never shall know—upon the bridge. The dog was not with him this time. It was a fine, sunny afternoon in May. Grief was no longer in his face. By his side was a very pretty, animated, rosy little woman whom I had never seen before. They walked close to each other, and she looked with the utmost tenderness into his face. She evidently was not yet entirely accustomed to the wedding ring which I observed upon her finger.

I think that tears came to my eyes at this sight. Those great brown eyes, the plush sack, the lovely face that had borne the impress of sorrow and so speedily had felt death—these might never have existed so soon had they been forgotten by the one being in the world for whom that face had worn the aspect of a perfect love.

Yet one upon whom those eyes never rested has remembered. And surely the memory of her is mine to vend, since his whose right it was to cherish it, had allowed himself to be divorced from it in so brief a time.

The memory of her is with me always, fills my soul, beautifies my life, makes green and radiant this existence which all who know me think cold, bleak, empty, repellent.

You will not laugh then, my friend, when I tell you that love is not to me a thing unknown.

So runs a part of the last letter to my father that the old bookkeeper ever wrote.—R. N. S. in Philadelphia Press.

How Talmage Was Converted.
You can take any man for Christ if you know how to get at him. Truman Osborne, one of the evangelists who went through this country many years ago, had a wonderful art in the right direction. He came to my father's house one day, and while we were all seated in the room, he said, "Mr. Talmage, are all your children Christians?" Father said, "Yes, all but De Witt." Then Truman Osborne looked down into the fireplace and began to tell a story of a storm that came on the mountains, and all the sheep were in the fold; but there was one lamb outside that perished in the storm. Had he looked me in the eye I should have been angered when he told that story; but he looked into the fireplace, and it was so pathetically and beautifully done that I never found any peace until I was sure I was inside the fold, where the other sheep were.—Dr. Talmage in Ladies' Home Journal.

Physical Development as a Guide.
A paper on the scientific measurement of children was read before the Bromley (England) Naturalists' society. The author, Rev. H. A. Soames, said he found such measurements as he described, taken every term, a good guide as to whether his pupils could be pressed with work or not. If the increase is regular and the weight fair, according to the height, he does not fear to press them; but, if on the other hand the weight is low, or if the height increases and not the weight, or if the increase in height is too rapid, he thinks it a very fair excuse for laziness, and takes great care that too much work is not expected from them.

What a "Filled" Case Is.
To save the gold and strengthen the case of watches, Joseph Fahy, a clever lad, born in French Switzerland nearly half a century ago, rolled out two plates of gold and put a plate of composition metal between made a "filled case." Since then he has brought the process to perfection, and his filled cases are now known to every jeweler on earth. They are not plated cases. They would, without the composition metal filling, be a double case thicker than heavy writing paper.—New York Truth.

All Cures to Be Made Straight.
Some day railroads will have in them no dangerous and deadly curves. Over half the disastrous collisions and a large percentage of run-offs are caused by curves. Of course, it will sometimes be found difficult to straighten out a curve and keep a legitimate grade; but if the laws required all railroads to go straight in all cuts and other dangerous places some plan would be devised by which this could be done.—Dallas (Tex.) News.

Working for their Board.
Two famous philosophers—Menememus and Aesclepiades—when pursuing their studies at Athens, were enabled to pay for their support and schooling by acting as millers after school hours, receiving the magnificent sum of thirty-six cents (two drachms) per night. Happily their fellow students, upon hearing this, raised a subscription sufficient to defray the expenses of these deserving young men.—Detroit Free Press.

Tarantulas Are Enemies.
Tarantulas are considered deadly foes to each other and are seldom found in company. When imprisoned together there is a fight, one succumbs and is eaten by the victor. Nature has done a service in making the tarantulas so hideous and formidable looking an object. Indeed, it is owing to this repulsiveness that no greater number of persons are stung. The sight of the great hairy spider crawling near by will cause a cold creeping sensation down the back of almost any one.—Florence Companion.

Machine Made Love.
Clarice—And so your engagement with Maitland is really off?
Isabel—Yes. I got tired of machine made love.
Clarice—Machine made love! What do you mean?
Isabel—He wrote all his letters on a typewriter.—Exchange.

Competitive games, especially intercollegiate, in which many elements combine to carry the excitement to the highest degree, are dangerous, not only in the final decisive struggle, but in the long preliminary training.

Important Things in Court.

A witness was testifying that he met the defendant at breakfast, and the latter called the waiter and said:—"One moment," exclaimed the counsel for the defense, "I object to what he said."

Then followed a legal argument of about an hour and a half on the objection, which was overruled, and the court decided that the witness might state what was said.

"Well, go on and state what was said to the witness," remarked the opposing counsel, "swear with his legal victory."
"Well," replied the witness, "he said, 'Bring me a breakfast and fried potatoes.'"

A FINE PLACE FOR BOYS.

Holt's Oak Grove School is unquestionably one of the best schools for boys on the Pacific Coast. It is located near Millbrae, San Mateo county, Cal., in charge of Ira G. Holt, Ph.D., ex-State Superintendent, with a first-class corps of seven teachers. The place is beautiful and healthy. The number of pupils is limited to fifty so that special, individual attention may be given to each.

A farmer who wished to enter some animals at an agricultural exhibition wrote as follows to the secretary:—"Enter me for a Jackass."

SELF-PRaise.

Self-praise is no recommendation, but there are times when one must permit a person to tell the truth about himself. When what he says is supported by the testimony of others no reasonable man will doubt his word. Now, to say that ALL-COCK'S POASTERS are the only genuine and reliable porous plasters made is not self-praise in the slightest degree. They have stood the test for over thirty years, and in proof of their merit it is only necessary to call attention to the cure which they have effected and to the voluntary testimonials of those who have used them.

Beware of imitations, and do not be deceived by misrepresentation. Ask for ALL-COCK'S, and let no solicitation or exhibition induce you to accept a substitute.
