Hotel, restaurant and pool inspections online

Oregon residents and visitors can now check out online inspection reports for restaurants, hotels and swimming pools throughout the state.

The Oregon Health Authority has launched a new website that will collect the reports from 34 of the state's 36 counties. Multnomah and Washington counties have their own sites.

The service has long been available in other cities and states. Oregon's data system, which dates to 1994, didn't even allow counties to download their own reports.

The computer system was so bad that Oregon was dropped from a 2010 U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention multi-state study of pool violations.

The new system took about two years and cost $120,000 to implement, OHA spokesman Jonathan Modie said.

It will also collect inspection data in a way that will help OHA and county health departments identify violation trends.

Oregon has about 25,000 licensed food, pool and lodging facilities. They include restaurants, mobile units, commissaries, warehouses, vending operations, swimming pools, spas, travelers' accommodations, recreational parks and organizational camps.

Inspections won't appear on the site until two weeks after they are conducted, to allow time for managers to review them and to settle any disputes with facility operators.

"We felt like two weeks to get those inspection reports into the database is a fair amount of time," Modie said. "The goal here really is to ensure public health and safety."

Inspections are unannounced. They focus on items most likely to cause illness or injury to patrons, but also include items such as general cleanliness and maintenance.

In a food service facility, the focus is on approved food sources, cooking temperatures, holding temperatures of food, personal hygiene of food handlers and contaminated or dirty equipment.

For a public pool or spa, the emphasis is on proper disinfection, clarity, entrapment concerns, proper filtration and the pool enclosure.

Tourist facilities are evaluated for safety and general sanitation concerns.
