Mt. ANGEL — The Oregon Knights of Columbus state officers and Past State Deputies and their spouses have served pie and ice cream at Mt. Angel Seminary for many years, usually during mid-terms in early December.

But this year the group also sponsored a barbecue for the seminarians held during final's week as a send-off dinner before they head out to their dio-

Monsignor Joseph V. Betschart supported the May 4 event.

'The Monsignor was gracious and lent us a seminarian Anthony Shumway to help coordinate and assist during the afternoon," Past State Deputy Patrick Rice said.

In all, the Knights fed nearly 100 steaks to the seminarians, Abbotts Jeremy and Peter, monks, staff and crew. Rice said: "I truly believe God gave us a perfect day to share good fellowship."

Amazon has announced three Oregon fulfillment centers that all told are expected to employ about 3,500 work-

In 2017, Sanjay Shah, Amazon's then-vice president of North America Customer Fulfillment, said the Oregon investments would increase delivery speeds and expand inventories.

A Troutdale center maintains a smaller footprint than Salem's, though the company has hired an estimated 1,500 workers there. Troutdale distributes smaller items, such as batteries.

A Portland distribution center will be similar in size to Salem's.

When the center was announced in 2017, it was slated to employ more than 1,000 workers, though it remains unclear when it will open.

"We want to launch Salem first," Brown said.

It makes more sense for Salem's center to serve more Oregon customers than operations in Northern California, she said. Meanwhile, the Portland hub will focus on serving customers in the Portland-Vancouver area.

life into it.

"On the city dime, it will not happen," Sublimity Mayor Jim Kingsbury said. "We have limited resources and when we are able to leverage those resources with grant money, that's the way nice buildings get built. We can have things that look nice and can maintain them."

The bathrooms were built in a corner of the park formerly occupied by playground equipment for toddlers.

That equipment - including a rocking horse, a rocking plane, a slide and balance beam - will be relocated elsewhere in the park.

New bathrooms might not seem like much, but in the city of about 3,000, it's a big deal.

"Is it important to the city? Yeah." Kingsbury said. "We need some place for kids to go, for families to go.

"It's a route home for a lot of kids that are going from school to home. It's important enough that the bathrooms are getting enough use that we had to think of something to do. This came along and anytime we can get free money, it's important to pursue it.'

Sublimity was one of over 40 to apply for grants from the Land and Water Conservation Fund in the 2018 grant cy-

Of the 13 that received grants from the fund, Sublimity was one of the smallest entities.

Where the city received less than the $389,092 Tualatin Hills Park & Recreation District received, the money Sublimity will make a bigger impact.

"With this park, Sublimity has given the community a place to get out, picnic, play and enjoy family and friends," said Michele Scalise, lead grant program coordinator for Oregon Parks and Recreation Department. The former bathrooms and tennis court in the park were built after a similar grant in the 1970s. The former bathrooms have been converted into a storage project.

After being notified the city would be receiving the grant in April 2018, the city broke ground in January and the bathrooms were finished by April.

"We did it pretty quickly," Frost said. "I think the deadline to this project was November 2020."

The city used all local companies to build the bathrooms including Manning Concrete of Stayton, Blazer Industries in Aumsville to build the building, Spaniols of Stayton for the plumbing, Pacific Coast Electric in Stayton and Canyon Contracting of Stayton for the site work.

The city had to come up with $126,000 for its 50% of the match, and it did so out of its general fund.

But it was an investment the city was happy to make.

"It sets a tone for the city on what it is that we value," Kingsbury said.
