tricts that receive revenue from state forests." State Forests Division Chief Liz Dent said after the verdict was announced.

"We are disappointed that the jury did not agree, but we respect their time commitment and the disruption to their daily lives as they analyzed complex information and difficult legal questions," Dent said.

Environmental groups said they were disappointed in the decision.

"The state did the right thing in arguing for balanced management of our public forests," said Bob Van Dyk, Oregon and California policy director for the Wild Salmon Center. "Salmon are a forest product, just like trees. Now the weak rules to protect salmon on private industrial forests could spread onto public forests."

It's uncertain where the money to pay the counties would come from.

"Today's verdict was not an unexpected first step in what will be a lengthier legal process, and it would be premature at this point to make budget decisions based on the jury's decision," said Charles Boyle, a spokesman for Gov. Kate Brown.

The state is likely to appeal the case.

'We will be reviewing options and next steps with attorneys from the Oregon Department of Justice," Dent said.

How did we get here?

The roots of the lawsuit go back more than 80 years, when counties began deeding the state forestland that timber companies had cut over and abandoned to foreclosure, or that had been burnt in major forest

The state manages the forests, and the counties get a cut of the profits.

A 1941 agreement requires Oregon to manage the forests for "the greatest permanent value of those lands to the state."

The jury was charged with deciding exactly what state lawmakers meant when they wrote those words in 1941.

In the late 1990s the Oregon Department of Forestry adopted rules defining what that phrase meant. Their management goals include recreation, clean air and drinking water, preserving habitat for native species, and more.

But the counties said the state should have been maximizing revenue by logging the forests the same as private timber companies do. Timber harvests on state forests have increased over the past two decades. But the counties argued that they should have been higher.

In its court filings, Oregon said the case is the first time in Oregon, and perhaps the nation, that a jury trial has been held in a statutory contract case.

Who is behind the lawsuit?

The first two phases of the lawsuit were funded by two timber companies, Hampton Tree Farms and Stimson Lumber; as well as the timber trade group Oregon Forest Industries Council, and The Sustainable Forests Fund, which was formed in 2016.

The counties' law firm has taken on the rest on a 15% contingency. The firm, Davis Wright Tremaine, stands to get a fee of about $160 million about three times as much as Oregon spends managing the state forests each year.

Fourteen other counties with state forests joined Linn County in the class-action suit, as did dozens of local taxing districts.

Clatsop County, which has the most state forestland, opted out of the lawsuit, and Klamath County was eliminated.

What does the verdict mean?

Oregon's state forests total 745,000 acres.

That's a small area, compared with national forests, at about 16 million acres; and private forests which total about 7.3 million acres.

But the state forests include some of Oregon's most popular recreation areas, are the source of drinking water for about 400,000 residents, and contain habitat salmon and other native species.

Marion County has about 18,331 acres in the Santiam State Forest, which also spans Linn and Clackamas counties. It includes Shellburg Falls Recreation Area, Santiam Horse Camp, and Rock Creek Campsites.

There are about 6,048 acres of state forest in

Although the counties said they were asking only for a monetary award, state officials say the ultimate goal is a change in management priorities for the forests.

It's unlikely that industry helped fund the lawsuit without expecting any economic benefit in return, the state's lawyers said in court filings.

"That economic benefit could only come from a change in the state management policy regime providing for larger timber harvests across the state forest land base...' they wrote.

In court last week, the counties' lawyers suggested that, by paying an award for future losses, the state could avoid increasing harvests.

But State Forester Peter Dougherty said if the jury found the law requires the state to manage the forests for the greatest timber revenue, it would have to do so. That would mean stepping up timber sales.
