The end is near, or at least smoky

During a recent 2020-resolution-inspired push to filter some of the clutter on an external hard drive, I came across a photo that a friend, Paul, emailed me more than a decade ago.

He discovered an eBay ad for an antique "medical" device.

To coin a phrase, or to butcher another, deception is the sincerest form of quackery.

Before you read further, look at the picture and see if you can figure out what it is.

Ready?

It's a mechanism for administering, seriously, "tobacco smoke enemas" (ask your grandfather).

The device, according to the ad text, was in vogue from the "1750s until 1810s" and was used "for the resuscitation of drowning victims."

"The warmth of the smoke was thought to promote respiration."

Lack of the effectiveness indicates that the procedure wasn't long-lived. Neither, apparently, were the patients on whom it was administered.

The punch line is that the elaborate fakery is thought to be the inspiration for the phrase to "blow smoke up one's a--."

So now you know. Happy New Year! (again).
