Osteopathy and Surgery.

Surgery and Osteopathy may be termed sister sciences, as they are both based upon exact laws. The surgeon and Osteopath must have an accurate knowledge of Anatomy. The science of Osteopathy has, however, rendered the use of the knife unnecessary in a great many cases, where it was formerly indicated and employed. We can never hope to entirely escape the use of the knife, but there is no question but that the surgery of the hour is hasty, rash and indiscriminate. It was never intended that recourse to the knife should be employed in every indication of disordered function. Nature herself cries out against this outrage and at the same time provides for the diseased organ or tissue, through Osteopathy, that assistance which supplies recuperative powers sufficient to heal without the intervention of surgical procedure

Osteopathy, however recognizes the
