AN OPINION

E H Pratt A M, M-D, L L, D a high medical authority, in a paper read before an assembly of his own profession says:

"Osteopathy is not a science based upon an accurate knowledge of regional anatomy, but an art to acquire which, requires an educated sense of touch, a thorough knowledge of action and reaction in the various forms of disease, and the courage of one's convictions."

"Osteopathy has the advantage of surgery in that it reduces minor luxations and dislocations, which more frequently than is commonly supposed are effective barriers to the recovery of health so long as they remain uncorrected: while, without examining a person from an osteopathic standpoint these luxations and dislocations would undoubtedly entirely escape observation. So Osteopathy must rank as one of the most important measures known for the relief of all forms of chronic ailments. * * * As to the method of applying principles in practice it is an effort of Osteopaths to reach sympathetic nerve centers at every available point."
