SIGNS OF THE TIMES

An M. D. Tells His Fellows Why They Should Become Doctors of Osteopathy as He Has Himself Done

One of the most interesting episodes in the world of healing recently has been the publication in the Medical World, of Philadelphia, of a series of articles telling practitioners of the old school, most of whom have been inclined to hold aloof, just why they should study the new science and take up its practice if they honestly care to know and use the most modern and effective methods of helping the ailing body

THE AUTHOR A FORMER M. D.

That the author of the articles, Dr. W. A. Hinckle, of Peoria, Ill., is able to sign himself both M. D. and D. O. is not surprising, as not a few present practitioners of Osteopathy were formerly doctors of the old schools. They have simply discovered a better way and been quick to study it at a school devoted to the new science and then to adopt it. That more have not done so is undoubtedly due to the fact that they have not given it a fair hearing. We have not heard of any case in which a Doctor of Medicine, after studying the new science, returned to the practice of administering evil drugs to his patients.

OSTEOPATHY AND MASSAGE

Dr. Hinckle's articles, addressed as they were to the medical profession, were rather technical and lengthy, so that The Right Way, much as it would like to do otherwise, can give but an extract or two at present. They are taken just as they appeared with the peculiar phonetic spelling used in the Medical World. This is the way in which Dr. Hinckle disposes of the old allegation that Osteopathy is simply massage:

"The work of the masseur is all good and valuable in its particular sphere, but it has neither the sphere nor the precision of osteopathy. What the eegins wiper is to the skilled mechanic the masseur is to the scientific osteopath. Massage is to osteopathy what patent medicine is to scientific medication: a shotgun prescription without positive diagnosis or accurate prescribing. True, both osteopathy and massage are mechanical and in that respect they are similar.

Surgical operations and the reduction of fractures are also mechanical, but on that account could hardly be classed with massage. Homeopathy and allopathy are both systems of medicine, yet one is the antithesis of the other."

WHETHER TOO MUCH IS CLAIMED

"But we osteopaths are accused of claiming too much for osteopathy. Perhaps we do, but having repeatedly proven its merits, our judgment on the subject should be of more value than that of those who have not done so. To all such I can but reply in the words of Newton, who when ridiculed concerning his theory of gravitation said: "Sir, I have investigated these things: you have not."

"The all the common diseases, both acute and chronic, both infectious and non-infectious, have been treated osteopathically with the most encouraging results; it does not claim to be a cure-all. If it possesses but one half the truth claimed for it by those who know most of the subject, it would still demand consideration by every physician and would rank as the greatest contribution to therapeutics for no other has so wide a sphere of usefulness."—The Right Way
