Appendicitis, Pneumonia and Typhoid

Such frightful crises in life as appendicitis, pneumonia and typhoid fever are the result of blocked nutrition—that is to say, interrupted nerve or blood supply in definite areas of the anatomy. In appendicitis the seat of interference is near the union of the large and small intestines, in the small vestigial, or remnant, stomach known as the vermiform appendix; in pneumonia the inflammation is in the lungs; in typhoid fever it is in the lining of the intestines. Osteopathy lifts such blockades and removes the causes of inflammation wherever they are established, and, if it is applied in time, it averts the oncoming of these localized inflammatory maladies.
