AMUSEMENTS

A NEW PLAY

A new and modern play by Hal Reid will be presented at Steward's opera house. "At Cripple Creek," is the title of the piece and the scenes are laid in a mining camp among the Rockies in the early eighties. The story told is very interesting and uplifting in tone and the play abounds in wholesome and hearty comedy. It is acknowledged by competent critics that not since Bartley Campbell's masterpiece "My Partner" has so well written a play, dealing with life in the Great West, been given to the American stage.

TO NIGHT

There have been myriads of good fights in recent years. Some of these bouts have been shown in moving pictures and some have not, but every man who has seen the Britt-Nelson fight pictures declares emphatically that no fiercer, gamier battle ever was contested than the fray where the mighty Dane overthrew the native son. Courage of the highest type; heroic resistance to the attack of an overpowered foe, and unconquerable determination in assault—all these things stand out, colossal, and stamp the battle as a climax of bravery and fair honest struggling. It was a wonderful fight—and the pictures tell the story better than any words could do.

J. W. Coffroth, president of the Colma (Cal.) Athletic Club, where the fight occurred, is the owner of the copyrighted films.

The pictures may be seen at Steward's Opera House Wednesday evening, Jan. 3.

REFUGEES TELL STORIES OF HORRORS IN RUSSIA

Children Torn From Mothers and Rent and Torn—Dead Children Used as Clubs.

New York, Jan. 3.—Stories of horrors so revolting as to be almost beyond belief are told by many of the 1300 Russian refugees, who arrived here Friday on the Hamburg American steamer Graf Waldersee. Although coming from widely separated parts of the Russian empire, the stories of all of them were markedly similar. Torture and death in all their most revolting forms were witnessed. Children were snatched from their mothers and their little bodies rent and torn. Mothers and fathers were struck down in the midst of their families. One little girl, Rosa Rosenski, a child of 9 years, came over with her brother Isaac about the same age. These two children are the remains of a family of 10 persons, the other eight having been killed by the Cossacks at Moscow. Hirsch Siedlitz, who was a storekeeper in Kieff, told of his flight from that city, after a massacre of Jews in the market square. He said: "At midday on Friday, three weeks ago, a bugle sounded two blocks distant. A second, third and fourth bugle answered the first and next came a clatter of hundreds of horses hoofs, and the Cossacks rode pell mell through the streets leading to the market place and fell upon the market men and the women and children. "I was in the market place at the time. I don't know how I escaped. The women wore on their breasts tiny red rosettes, the emblem of the revolutionary party, and these were selected as targets for the lances held by the Cossacks. The women seldom missed their mark. The women and children were kicked, shot down and trampled upon. Everywhere was blood. Dead children were used as clubs for women suspected by the Cossacks as being the mothers of those children. Thousands of corpses were gathered up after the carnage."
