A MAIL ORDER INCIDENT

In the great mail order business which flourishes in this country there are occasional, yes frequent incidents which show the customers of these houses the folly of sending away from home to purchase goods. A farmer sent to one of these firms and bought a cook stove for less than his home merchant could sell it. After using it two weeks, he wrote to the firm of whom he purchased it and said: "the covers on my stove have warped, although it has been in use but two weeks." The firm, always prompt, immediately acknowledged the letter and offered the following suggestion: "No doubt your fire has been too hot. Turn the covers over and see if they won't warp back again. Such is the general satisfaction obtained in dealing with strangers and those at a distance. That farmer has likely learned a lesson which will be valuable to him in future dealings and the home firm has gained a customer.—Eugene Register.
