OIL FUEL FOR WARSHIPS

(Scripps News Association)
Washington D. C. June 16—The naval engineers who are interested in finding some substitute for coal on board ship have little or no expectation of satisfactory results from the use of oil. Arrangements have been made for fitting out Wyoming with an apparatus for burning oil instead of coal, and experiments will be conducted by a board soon to be designated by Secretary Bonaparte, in an effort to ascertain whether oil is trustworthy and economical fuel for ships of war. It has been used to some extent in the smaller boats, especially in the torpedo craft, which ply in home waters where there is access to supplies of oil, but it is feared that there will be embarrassment for the larger ships which cruise afar and which visit foreign ports where they would not be likely to obtain oil so easily as they now purchase coal. The present saving resulting from the use of oil, moreover, would probably be removed, since any such employment of it would serve to increase the market prices. The principal objection to its use on shipboard, however, comes from the Naval General Board in a report which points out the difficulty and danger in carrying oil and the fact that its storage in tanks where the coal bunkers now are, would remove one of the means of protecting the vitals of the ship from attack.
