PRISONER WANTS MICE FOR PETS

"Take this horrid kitten out of my cell, it is eating all my little mice." So spoke Bernice Lockhart alias "Touch 'Em Sally" when Deputy Sheriff Johnson last evening opened the portal leading to the bastille where lies the morphine saturated speaker. As the deputy approached her cell she turned upon him a pair of glassy eyes, colored with precious little intellectual light, that spoke even more beseechingly than did the verbal appeal. Mr. Johnson quietly informed her that the cat's presence was made necessary for the very reason that mice were accumulating and must be gotten rid of. During the brief reply of the deputy her fingers twitched and twined nervously about the cot covers as though they were straining their highest sense of touch to locate a pill containing "dope," and after pondering the reply for a minute, she dropped her cloggy head to the pillow, seemingly still unsatisfied as to the reason why mice should be so mercilessly massacred.

The dialogue would naturally provoke a laugh because of the utter absurdity of the request. Rather than that it illustrated what blend the mind takes when unoccupied. For weeks this woman has lain on that cot with nothing to divert her mind and soul from its cravings for morphine other than these little mice in question. The glittering eye, the hasty scramble across the cell, the occasional nibble at a piece of cloth by her tiny so-called friends, have served to pass many a lonely minute for her. As her stay in the cell continued, she grew even more fond of her little visitors and now she reserves a crumb or two of her daily rations for Mr. Mouse. With the advent of the cat, the mouse has "Skidoed" and kitty takes its place. Were her stay in Union county's jail not so near an end, due to the fact that she will soon be incarcerated in the state prison, she would no doubt soon form an intimate liking for the less obnoxious animal, the cat.
