PARSIFAL PLEASES A PACKED HOUSE

Messrs Martin and Emery have come and gone with their production of Parsifal and La Grande has seen a really and truly great drama. At the appointed hour the curtain rose for the first act and the crowded house settled down for three hours of entertainment. After the usual introductory lines Parsifal appeared. This character in the hands of Mr. Connor was above par. Parsifal as pictured in the script as an ignorant, kind hearted shepherd, who had lived in the mountains with no other human companion than his loving mother. Those who have read this prelude in the translations to the English no doubt marveled at the skill of the writer and translator, but even this was weak compared with the first glimpse that the audience got of Parsifal last evening. Perfect of physique, carrying his shepherd's staff, his every facial feature told of blissful ignorance.

His voice too, was excellent and during the entire performance there was not a syllable that escaped the most remote listeners. The troupe carries three or perhaps four artists. The three are Parsifal, Kundry and Klingshor, but the fourth who is nearly on a class with the three is Titorel the Capadocian king and the original protector of the holy spear and grail. Kundry as the tool of Klingshor, certainly was a pleasing personage. Her beauty and she was beautiful, made it a short task to pull the newly appointed king and holy grail protector from his knighthood to the plane of a common warrior and king. Especially in the second scene of the third act, did she excel. And Klingshor. Here is a part that takes ability, real ability to carry. When every effort of he and his tool has failed to tempt Parsifal, and the comrade of satan had called upon all his uncanny spirits to assist him in his one great ambition, the audience suddenly saw some great acting. Not the light kind that causes the gallery to hoot in derision, but some heavy work that fanned the already weird feelings of the spectators to a tension that can only be duplicated by the chaldron scene in Macbeth. The electrical effects were mysterious but lent the desired effect.

The drama is too long to properly portray three hours. Then too the scenery was abbreviated because of insufficient room. Because of this abbreviation both in scenery and actual running lines the audience was of necessity forced either to guess at the minus chain of the plot or resort to recollections of former reading. Because of this shortage the connection of the holy grail to the holy spear was a mystery to many. In the original, the holy grail for which knights have searched since the time of creation of Knights was in the possession of this little band mythically located in the Northern Spain. The only defense other than their right good swords that these knights had to defend the coveted cup, with was the holy spear. With the spear in their possession the defenders were invulnerable. Klingshor, a representative and comrade of the devil thru the medium of Kundry, secures the holy spear and flees. Parsifal a "guileless fool" and shepherd comes to the scene willing to carry the sword of the good knights and assist in the search for the stolen spear, for without it, the grail was in constant danger. After ten years of wondering he overpowers the temptations of Kundry overpowers the will and physical power of Klingshor, returns to the grail and ultimately fulfills the prophecy that the little band would be ruled by the guileless fool.

However there was a feature of the play that was more humorous than anything else. The word Parsifal naturally recalls to one, a thot of Wagner's wonderful overtures. However withal just dues to the ability of the orchestra present to disperse better music. The tension of the crowd was let down suddenly, after the close of the third act, by a rendition of "Goodbye Dolly I Must Leave You" and a medley of other ragtime songs.
