Croup

When a child wakes up in the middle of the night with a severe attack of croup as frequently happens, no time should be lost in experimenting with remedies of a doubtful value. Prompt action is often necessary to save life.

Chamberlain's Cough Remedy

has never been known to fail in any case and it has been in use for over one-third of a century. There is no other remedy that can be depended upon. Why experiment? It is pleasant to take and contains no harmful drugs. Price, 5 cents; large size, 50 cents.

The following August it rained 24 out of the 31 days and yet that summer was one of the best for 20 years. It is generally a struggle for the farmers to save their hay, and they still work in the good old way, viz: Mow with scythe and rake with hand rake, but it seems with the majority that time is no object, and what was good enough for their ancestors is good enough for them. Nevertheless I saw quite a number of American machines for sale and I presume Uncle Sam will get them sold all O. K.

I wonder how some of our western people would like to work for 24 cents per diem and yet I have seen men work all day for shilling, British, with one or two meals thrown in. I fancy I hear some of our people say, "I would not do it." Well, if they were in the same predicament they would have to starve. It seems the people have been ground down so long, that all their ambition has evaporated and they at least have become resigned to their lot in life. In such a state of affairs can you wonder at those who have ambition left, to try and get away from such a condition. I trow not. While I was there they were leaving the hundreds per month, and mostly for the United States or Canada; some to the Australian colonies, and some to South Africa.

And now in regard to the land tenure. Since the home rule agitation the government has voted so many millions for the purchase of large estates and sell them to the farmers, charging them 4 per cent, and eventually the farmer will own his holding. It is something like the deferred payment system, if I understand rightly. In 1904 the government set aside $4,000,000 for this object, so you see in time there will be the "possibility" of a happy future for Ireland, especially if the people will cast aside the old-time antagonism and live in harmony, one with the other. But as long as that old party feeling prevails, so long will there be tumult and disorder. There is only one way to accomplish this desirable end and that is for people to live the royal law and do unto others as they'd like others to do unto them.

In my labors amongst the people I had ample opportunity of seeing and studying their every-day lives, coming, as I did, in contact with all sorts and conditions of humanity. I found the same old class distinctions still in vogue, and I suppose always will be. If some of our good western people could see the poverty and destitution that is in evidence in most all the cities, their hearts would be touched, I am sure; and with it all you would see the poor manifest toward each other a love and pity the rich seldom show.

And now for a more genial theme. The tourist must not leave this good old land of Saint Patrick without seeing the various places of interest, such as the Lakes of Killarney, the Wicklow mountains, and by the way, they need not be afraid to pay a visit there, as I think all the wild Irish have been caught. Ha, ha! The scenery is rugged and beautiful, and well worth a trip. Then there is the meeting of the waters in the beautiful Vale of Avoca, where Tom Moore was inspired to write his poem of that name. And again, there's the Blarney stone, high up in the wall of Castle Blarney, in County Cork. By kissing that stone all people inclined to be tongue tied may become fluent you've kissed the Blarney stone."

And now there is one of the wonders of the world, the noted Giant's Causeway up in the northeastern part of the island, in the county Antrim, said county being the birthplace of our late lamented President William McKinley.

Many and various are the theories of the formation of the Causeway, but I think it is still a mystery. There's the great Causeway and little Causeway. This is a most wonderful work of nature. The rocks seem as if they were hewn by the hands of man. They are concave and convex, placed side by side, and are quite smooth. No doubt they are the action of the elements. There are about 60,000 of them, as far as can be seen, and all I can say is that it is truly magnificent and worthy of all commendation as a wonder of nature. There are the beautiful cafes, three in number, but they can only be entered on a calm day, as the ingress is from the ocean. As it happened, Father Neptune was in his happiest mood the day I visited, and after securing a boat manned by two of the natives we entered the first cave, which is named "Port-coon." After getting well in we could see the bottom, which was covered with beautiful, silvery sand.

The height of the cave is 90 feet, and it is seamed with colored rock, giving it a rich and beautiful appearance. Before pulling out, at a word from one of the boatmen, an old man at the entrance of the cave fired off a pistol for our edification, that we might enjoy the echo, and on coming out he held a long pole with a bag attached at the end of it to hold our offering in payment for the echo. Of course, we did not disappoint him, and he was made happy in proportion to the amount he received. We visited another and largest cave, called Dunkerry. It was like the other, only more grand and massive. On coming out into the open sea we got a fine view of The Organ, the Lovers' Leap, Wishing Chair, Chimney Pot, etc.

On landing I was introduced to the Wishing Well and the patron saint,—"in the shape of an old lady"—who graciously presented me with a glass of water, at the same time telling me my wish would be granted, for which I donated a silver piece to her saintship.

It may interest you to hear the peasants' theory of the Causeway, which is as follows: An Irish giant, one Fin MacCool, having a dare to engage in battle with the Scotch giant of his day, and as the Scotchman could not come to Ireland, Fin built the Causeway. But when Fin saw the Scotch giant coming and noted his tremendous size, he ran to his house and asked his wife to cover him up with the bedclothes, and when the Scot inquired for Fin, his wife told him for the love of the Virgin don't wake the child, for if Fin heard it cry and found you were the cause, Arrah, shure he'd murder you entirely.

The Scot looked and seeing the huge bulk in the bed, thought that was his child, what must Fin be like? so concluded he'd got a sudden call home and he "got."

Before leaving Ireland duty called me to the city of Dublin, the capital, and I found it the same old city I had known 30 years ago, with the exception of the electric cars, and by the way, in riding from O'Connell's monument to the Phoenix park in these same cars, I found one of my senses that I thought lost for a long time. I mean my sense of smell, for I got a waft from the river Liffey, that gave me an assurance that all my senses were in force, and I can assure you there was nothing of the perfume of Araby the blest, in that waft.

Before leaving I visited one of the largest breweries in the world, I mean Guinness'. It is a large affair, and I should say an up-to-date concern. Its buildings cover nine acres, and they supply a guide to show visitors through and describe the various processes of Stout making. The British government first knighted Mr. Guinness and then created him a Peer of the Realm under the title of Lord Iveagh. So you see there is something in the manufacture of Stout other than Liffey water.

And now I must bid farewell to my many friends of the ever green isle, the land of hospitable homes and warm, impulsive hearts, and shall ever keep in remembrance the friendship shown, and which I hope always to retain, for those that live on the shamrock shore. Adieu.

This is the testimony of every typewriter user who knows by experience the relative performance of writing machines.

The man of all men who swears by the Remington is the man who has tried to get the same service out of some other machine.

A man may know the Remington or he may know some other typewriter, but the man who really knows typewriters is the man who knows the difference between the Remington and others.
