NEW DEVICE FOR RESCUE WORK IN COAL MINES.

In accordance with their policy of investigating every promising method for reducing the risks of mining, the anthracite coal operators have just made a test of new life-saving apparatus. It is a German invention, and its function is to keep the man who wears it supplied with pure air while he fights mine fires or rescues comrades who have been overcome.

The test took place in one of the mines near Scranton. About 30 officials of the companies gathered to witness it. A mine gangway was allowed to fill with gas, for the purposes of the test. Two volunteers, fitted out with the helmets, explored the gangway and chambers branching out from it. Emerging from the gas, they reported themselves none the worse for the experience.

The chief part of the Draeger apparatus, so called after its inventor, is carried upon the back; it includes cylinder tanks of oxygen, and potash cartridges for absorbing carbonic acid gas exhaled from the lungs. The oxygen, contained in the cylinder, at an initial pressure of 2000 pounds, issues to the helmet at the proper rate for consumption by the lungs. The exhaled air at the same time is purified by passing through the potash cartridges, and is used over again in conjunction with the fresh oxygen from the tanks. The apparatus will supply air to the wearer for two hours without replenishing.

Recent disasters in bituminous mines in this country and abroad have aroused widespread interest in the subject of mine accidents. The United States government, even, has conducted inquiries into the causes of accidents, with a view to finding means to prevent them. In the anthracite mines of Pennsylvania measures for the protection of the miners have been so perfected that fatalities are practically limited to such as are brought about by carelessness or deliberate negligence.

This device now being investigated is designed for use in either smoke or in the deadly gas which occasionally fills sections of mines. The ventilating systems installed by the anthracite companies are so complete that the gas is rarely allowed to form in dangerous volume, but the companies, nevertheless, provide the most modern equipment for rescue work. Officials are on constant watch for inventions which may reduce the dangers of the miner's occupation.

Though they prepare thus for fire-fighting and rescues, the companies seek to put most emphasis upon the prevention of conditions which lead to fires and explosions. To this end they have a thorough system of inspection as well as thorough ventilation. The state of Pennsylvania has 20 inspectors on duty in the anthracite region, and they co-operate with the company officials in preventing accidents. Taking in the whole state there are more mine inspectors on duty in Pennsylvania than in all of Great Britain and Ireland.

One of the greater obstacles in the way of reducing the number of mine accidents is the supplanting of the Anglo-Saxon miners by a miscellaneous foreign element. These foreigners, speaking a dozen or more different languages, are below the British and Germans in education and general deficiency, and they are careless of their own lives and the lives of others. It has been found possible, too, sometimes, to buy miners' certificates, and thus avoid the effect of the law which requires experience before the state will grant a certificate. In this way incompetent men often get into the mines, and the operators are powerless to prevent it.

Instructions are printed in every language spoken in the mines, and are posted prominently where all the mineworkers may see them. In many instances, however, the state inspectors have learned that the men pay too little attention to the notices.

GUARDIAN SALE.

Death Was on His Heels.

Jesse P. Morris of Skippers, Va., had a colic call in the spring of 1906. He says: "An attack of pneumonia left me so weak and with such a fearful cough that my friends declared consumption had me, and death was on my heels. Then I was persuaded to try Dr. King's New Discovery. It helped me immediately, and after taking two and a half bottles I was a well man again. I found out that New Discovery is the best remedy for coughs and lung disease in all the world." Sold under guarantee at the Newlin drug store. 50c and $1. Trial bottle free.
