EASTERN OREGON RAINFALL.

Western Portion of the State No Wetter Than the Eastern.

The wetness of wet western Oregon weather is little if any weiter than the dryness of dry eastern Oregon, according to the report of the Oregon conservation commission, one of the interesting chapters of which relates to the precipitation of the state and the need for irrigation in Ore-

Although the eastern part of the tate has generally been famous for is aridity and the western part for its eavy rainfall, the average precipitation during the summer months shows but little difference between the two sections in rainfall.

In 1907, for instance, Pendleton's ainfall during the summer months exceeded that of either Eugene or Albany. In that year the precipitation here during July, August and September amounted to 2.07. Albany's rainfall was 1.95 inches and that at Eugene 1.76.

It is a striking comment upon the fine and equable climate of this section of the country and data given in the booklet seems to indicate that the valley, which has sneered at irrigation here will in the end have to come to it to get the best results from its own agriculture. According to a statement use of water at right time in the valley showed the following increase in production of crops common in that district: Corn, 71 per cent; potatoes, 180 per cent; onions, 150 pe: cent; upland hops, 80 per cent, and clover 300 per cent.

Although in summer rainfall Pendleton has equal or even better advantages than the valley during the rest of the year, the precipitation here is so much less as to make the climate considerable more desirable, and compared with Albany's 44 inches annually, Pendleton's 14.5 inches gives a promise of lots of sunshine and pleasant days. The load precipitation it divided on an average thus: Spring-4.2 Inches, summer, 1.8 mches; auumn, 3.8 inches, and winter, 4.7 in-

Contrasted, Albany has 10.9 in hes in spring, 2 in summer, 11.5 ir fall and in winter 19.8 inches, while the other valley towns sho wa simila: division of a rainfall that runs as high as 45 inches per annum, the sum of Portland's wetness.

ANNUAL ROLL CALL.

Beginning with tonight, the Odd Fellows of La Grande will have an annual roll call, and whether or not the members are present, some brief experience or incident that looks toward the good of the order will be read or spoken. If the member is present he will respond with a short story that hinges on Odd Fellowship. If absent. his letter will be read. Under the latter condition, letters have reached the officers of the lodge from four corners of the world, as members o the La Grande lodge have drifted to foreign ports and foreign countries Then, aside from the roll call which has been inaugurated as an annual affair, there will be 10 five-minute talks from members. Refreshments will be served following the roll call.
