THE FALL FRESHET.

An early November freshet is one of the usual things that owners of log booms and cultivators of bottom land in Western Oregon and Washington encounter now and then to their loss. The heavy rains of the past five days have sent many of the smaller streams tributary to the Columbia, Grays Harbor and Puget Sound out of their banks, working the disaster in the lines mentioned. Unlike the loss sustained from a September or October storm to a delayed grain harvest, the November loss in grain and logs is not the fault of those who sustain it. Up to the breaking of the storm and the ensuing freshet, the water in the logging streams were not high enough to float the log booms to the mills. Hence the exposed condition of the logs. As to the late potatoes and other root crops, they had not yet come to maturity; hence were not ready for gathering. The losses suffered while not heavy enough to affect the general prosperity of the sections visited, are yet heavy in individual cases.

As to the inconvenience caused by washing out or softening of the roads the case is different. It will continue in very many cases throughout the winter and will furnish the best of all arguments for substantially constructed highways. The argument is an old one; it is illustrated by straining horses pulling heavy wagons with light loads over roads that would be impassible but for the necessity of using them occasionally; by slack trade in village stores, slim attendance upon rural churches and schools and farmhouse isolation that becomes exceedingly dreary and monotonous before the winter is over. It is doubtful indeed, whether any argument would so emphasize the value of good roads as does the freshet, coming before the fall hauling of produce is fairly begun.
