OFFICIAL "OBJECTOR" QUILTS HIS THANKLESS TASK

Testing Strength of the Insurgents is one of his Tireless Duties to Perform. Representative Mann Went on a strike Recently.

Washington, March 5 (Special) Representative Mann of Illinois, the "official objector" for the Republican organization has objected to the orders he received and has thrown up the job. This was the most important piece of gossip going the rounds of the house just now, and speculation is rife as to who will be the man to succeed him in the thankless task. The matter is complicated to some extent in the eyes of the regulars by the fact that Mann insists on still playing the role to which he was assigned, and several times each day, delivers some stinging blows at pet projects of Uncle Joe's crowd. How to persuade Mann to quit objecting on his own hook is therefore likely to become a very serious question before many legislative days are past.

In his character of Objector-in-chief for the House Organization Mann was supposed to rise and make points of order or interpose other obstacles to the passage of measures that did not have the official O. K. Sometimes he is supposed to jump, somewhat lightly, it is true, on bills that the administration was pushing in order to find out just where the opposition stood and how much ammunition it had in its cartridge belt. If the diplomatic objections of the Official Objector developed the fact that the opposition was loaded for bear, the necessary tactics to drive it through, or slip it through, as the case happened to be, could be adopted in ample time to insure their success.

According to the story now being told, some of the leaders became miffed over the altogether too vigorous manner in which Mann picked flaws in certain of the appropriation bills, and asked the Speaker to have him called off. Someone—said to be Representative Dwight, the Republican Whip—approached Mann and intimated that he could make a greater hit with the Speaker and the other members of the organization if he would object a wee bit less strenuously here and there, to put on the soft pedal so to speak, when given the tin.

Now, Mann is somewhat independent in his manner, somewhat sudden in his temper, and somewhat outspoken in his views. Just what he told the emissary is not known, but it is understood that when Mann concluded his somewhat heated remarks the gentleman addressed had a perfectly clear idea of just what Mann thought of him, of the House Organization, of the Speaker, of the President, of the party in power and everything bearing upon or appertaining to the subject under discussion. He was also quite certain, that Mann would object as much as he pleased, whenever he pleased to any bills he pleased, and if he did not like it he knew what he could do about it now and in the future.

Of course all this is hearsay, but those who have watched the proceedings on the floor during the last few days have observed that Mann is in his seat every minute and seems to take great delight in swatting items in the appropriation bills.

It'd Better Do Something (Louisville Courier Journal)

The paper trust firm's less expensive to pay fines than to fight charges in the courts and more profitable to scorn the anti-trust law than to conform to them. What will the administration do about it?

STARLIGHT KING, 1910

Starlight King the high school riding horse owned by Dr. Phy, of Hot Lake and is said to be the most valuable animal outside of the circus ring in the Northwest. Its accomplishments are many and as the animal was a gift to Dr. Phy, from a sportsman friend, he deems his property most valuable. Stralight's style, beauty and education are the admiration of all who see him.
