TWELFTH NIGHT

Shakespearean Play to be Reproduced At the Isis.

This reproduction of one of Shakespeare's most pleasing comedies is satisfactory in every particular. The staging is according to the best traditions in Shakespeare's time and the acting is in harmony with the modern understanding of the piece. The story is known to all readers of English and need not be repeated. The acting appears to interperet what may be termed the modern impression of Shakespeare's drama. Manufacturers who seek to place such pictures before audiences numbering in the aggregate many thousands scattered through the country are to be commended. It brings to the many who really enjoy this drama an opportunity to see it adequately performed, and at a nominal cost. It elevates and improves the literary tastes and appreciation of the great mass of the people, performing in this way services which cannot be measured in material terms. Such work is in the nature of an educational service and is deserving of the heartiest support of all who are working for the improvement of humanity.
