PAN-AMERICAN PEACE TEMPLE

Features of Handsome Building Dedicated in Washington.

Built For Use of International Bureau of American Republics and Described by Andrew Carnegie, the Chief Donor, as a Temple of Peace, Commerce and Friendship.

What is declared by competent architects to be one of the most artistic buildings in the world was dedicated recently at Washington to the use of the bureau of American republics. The structure, of which former President Roosevelt laid the cornerstone two years ago, represents an expenditure of $1,000,000, of which amount Andrew Carnegie contributed $750,000 and the twenty-one American republics about $250,000. It has been described by Andrew Carnegie as a "temple of peace, commerce and friendship," and former Secretary Root called it a "capitol in the capital of the United States of all the American nations."

Sit on a Large Tract

The building occupies one of the best sites in Washington, at the junction of the White lot, mall and Potomac park, overlooking the Potomac river. It has a frontage of 100 feet and a depth of 200 feet and stands alone on a five acre tract of land formerly known as Van Ness park. The entire exterior is faced with white Georgia marble. The front of the building carries two monumental marble statuary groups, representing respectively North and South America. Above the former is a panel depicting Washington's farewell to his generals as the beginning of the era of peaceful governments in North America and the other showing the parting between Bolivar and San Martin, the liberators of South America.

The style of architecture is in a general way reminiscent of the best Latin American type of about 100 years ago. Entering through large bronze doors, one faces the courtyard, which in some respects is the most remarkable feature of the building. It is 50 by 52 feet and is covered by a large sliding glass roof operated by electricity, so that it can be closed in winter.

Large Assembly Hall.

The courtyard has an electric fountain in the center, with tropical plants and trees on the sides. The fountain is elaborate and was designed by Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney, daughter of the late Cornelius Vanderbilt. It plays in all the colors which are shown in the flags of the American republics.

On the south side of the first floor are offices for the clerical staff of the bureau. On the north side is the Columbus Memorial library, with a capacity of 175,000 volumes. On the second floor are the assembly hall, board rooms and offices of the officials of the bureau. The assembly hall is 102 by 70 feet. It will seat more than a thousand persons and is specially designed for international conferences, receptions to distinguished foreigners and other ceremonies.

A picturesque feature of the dedication ceremonies was the planting of a peace tree in the courtyard of the building by President Taft and Mr. Carnegie.
