RICE MYSTERY CLEARED.

Cleveland, Aug. 12.—Circumstances surrounding the death of William Rice, near his home at Euclid Heights, was revealed today by John Brown, the millionaire, who was a witness at the coroner's inquest. Brown said that the night Rice was killed, he saw two automobile drivers in a road, and told them that a man was dying. They offered assistance, which he declined. Being assured by the men they were doctors, and that everything possible was being done. Afterward he called up the hospital where the man was taken, and found it was his friend, and informed that it was Rice who had died, and been removed to the morgue. Brown said he did not know any enemies Rice might have had.

Daddy's Bedtime Story

Hard to Please Every-body

"You Two Ought to Be Carrying Him."

ONE evening the children, Jack and Evelyn, asked daddy to tell them "an old, old story—one that daddy liked to hear when he was a little boy." So daddy told them about the man and his son and their donkey.

"Once upon a time," daddy began, "there was a man who lived in Greece with his young son. He was a very poor man, and he became poorer and poorer until he had nothing left but a donkey. They needed food, so the man made up his mind to sell the donkey.

"Come, son," he said one morning, "we will go to town and sell poor Jack." So they tied a halter around Jack's neck and began walking to town. The first man they met laughed heartily at them, and when they asked him the reason he said it looked strange to him to see the man and boy walking along leading the donkey when one of them might just as well be riding on the donkey's back.

"Very well," said the man; "get up on the donkey's back, son, and we'll go to town that way."

"A little farther along they met another man. He looked at them and said, 'Shame on you, boy, to ride and let your father walk.' So the father made the boy get down, and he himself got on the donkey's back. They rode that way for a short distance until they met still another man. He said: 'Well, well, of all the foolishness—one of you walking when you might both be riding on the donkey! He is strong enough to carry you both.'

"The donkey's owner thought that was good advice, so he got on the donkey's back with the boy. After riding thus a short distance another man on the road called out to them:

"You two ought to be ashamed of yourselves—two of you on one small donkey. Why, instead of riding on that poor little donkey you two ought to be carrying him!"

"That was enough for the man. He made the boy get down from the donkey and got down himself. Then they cut a pole from a tree at the roadside, tied the donkey's feet together, and with the man at one end of the pole and the boy at the other they began to carry the donkey.

"Soon they reached a bridge over a deep river. The donkey, with his head hanging downward, saw his reflection in the water and became frightened. He began to kick and to struggle so hard that the man and the boy had to drop the ends of the pole. Then the donkey rolled over the side of the bridge into the river. Of course he could not swim with his feet tied, so he was drowned. And the end of the story is that the man lost his donkey as a result of trying to follow everybody's advice."
