TWELFTH SERIES.

DISEASES OF THE OPTIC NERVE.

Written for the Benefit of the Public. (By Dr. M. P. Mendelsohn, Doctor of Optics.)

Of all the diseases that affect the eye, perhaps one of the most insidious and dreaded, is paralysis or atrophy of the optic nerve. The victim is usually given but little warning of the approach of this trouble. The eyes may feel tired, there may be an itching, burning sensation, and they feel some better when closed and rested for a few minutes. In some instances the eyesight seems weak and the patient feels that it would be necessary to obtain glasses. He sees specks and spots floating before his vision. In some ways his eyesight seems normal, and in other ways it is poor or dim. Strong light affects him, and he avoids it. In some cases there is double vision.

Pains in the eye, are sometimes present but not always, headaches and impairment of taste, hearing and smelling occurs.

It must be noted that in a great many cases of paralysis of the optic nerve pain is not present at all. When pain is present it is often a sign of glaucoma.

The blurring of the sight, and floating specks, are many times the only symptoms of the beginning of atrophy or paralysis. In order to fully understand and explain intelligently, how easy it is to bring on this dangerous affliction, it will be well to give a limited description of the anatomy of those parts of the eye involved in this trouble.

The optic nerves start from the under side of the forward part of the brain, and pass through small openings in the skull, in order to enter the eye socket. These openings are extremely small, in fact just barely large enough to permit the passage of the nerves with their sheaths and arteries, and the slightest increase in the size of these arteries, or sheaths, as well as any enlargement of the nerves, causes them to stragulate or "choke" the nerve in the little hole in the skull. When any unnatural pressure, is brought to bear on the optic nerve, it begins to "go to sleep," that is, to become numbed and deadened. The sight now becomes dim and blurred. There is however, in the great majority of cases, no sense of pain. If the pressure on the optic nerve continues for too long a time, it goes to "sleep" forever; and you are hopelessly, totally blind. If you were to ask as to what causes the pressure on the nerves the answer would be: Congestion caused by eye-strain or over-working of the eyes. If you have ever noticed the way some folks read, you will notice that they hang or drop their heads, the blood vessels and muscles in this way becoming distended and stretched, the eye nerves and muscles in time become affected. You cannot afford to depend upon wearing glasses altogether. You must consult a good physician.

Inflammation of the optic nerve (Optic Neuritis) is distinguished by the following symptoms: The pupil becomes enlarged, swollen and prominent, the smooth, transparent, delicate appearance of the pupil is lost, and it assumes an opaque reddish-gray tint. The veins are much dilated, dark and often very painful. The disease generally affects both eyes and sight is often greatly impaired. Sometimes the loss of vision is very sudden, the patient becoming totally blind in a few hours, while in other cases, the vision is but little affected. The patient is often much troubled with subjective appearances of light, which from their fantastic shapes and constant presence may prove a source of great distress and anxiety. Inflammation of the optic nerve is generally accompanied by more or less marked symptoms of brain disease, such as loss of memory, giddiness, vomiting, impairment of the sense of smell, taste or hearing paralytic affections and severe headache.

Don't waste your money buying plasters when you can get a bottle of Chamberlain's Liniment for twenty-five cents. A piece of flannel dampened with this liniment is superior to any plaster for lame back, pains in the side and chest, and much cheaper.

Medicines that aid nature are always most successful. Chamberlain's Cough Remedy acts on this plan. It loosens the cough, relieves the lungs, opens the secretions and aids nature in restoring the system to a healthy
