"Can I Do Anything to Help You?"

Daddy's Bedtime

Story—The Pig's Two Wishes

DADDY gathered the kiddies up into his lap, thought for a moment or two and then told them this story: "There was once a nice little pig named Porky, but he was very unhappy because he had no curl in his tail. As all the other pigs except his mamma and papa laughed and made fun of him he left home one day and said he would never come back again. He was going through the woods and feeling very homesick and lonesome when he came to an old woman sitting on the stump of a tree, and she looked very pale and tired.

"Madam," said the little pig, "can I do anything to help you?" "Oh, I am so weak and hungry," she replied, and Porky at once gathered her a big lapful of nuts.

"That's very nice of you indeed," said the old woman, "and I must do something for you. I am a witch, and if you had called me names or passed on without helping me I might have changed you into a snake or frog. As you are so kind, however, you may make two wishes and they will be granted."

"Well," said the pig, "for one week I would like to be a big hornet and after that a pig with the longest and curliest tail that any one ever saw," and a second later he was a hornet and flying back home to see what was going on there. And he was just in time, too, for his mamma and papa were in trouble. They had such long, curly tails that the other pigs were jealous and were trying to drive them away, but Porky, who was now a hornet, stung the wicked fellows until they squealed and ran into their houses to escape him. And there he kept them all the time, while his mamma and papa lived outside and had all the good things for themselves. How they did laugh at their enemies! Every time one of the bad pigs stuck his head out Porky would sting it on the nose, and he just kept them squealing all the time. Sometimes one would venture out to get a bite to eat, and then the hornet would get on its back and ride all about, stinging the pig all the time.

"Well, on the sixth day after Porky had been changed into a hornet his enemies were almost starved to death and ready to be good all the rest of their lives, so the hornet flew away to wait for his other wish to come true. On the seventh day he found himself a pig again, and, oh, what a tail he had! It was longer than his body, with no less than four beautiful curls in it, and when he went back to his home again you should have heard the praise he got. The pigs at once chose him for their king, and he and his mamma and papa lived in the best house in Pigland and were the happiest porkers in all the land."

Passing of The Hermit Kingdom

JIU JITSU hold is a hard thing to break. We may squirm and protest, but down we go. If you don't believe it ask the Koreans.

Japan got a jiu jitsu grip on Korea, and what has been the result? That country has been laid on its back, so to speak—in fact, wiped off the map. Korea is no longer Korea, the Hermit Kingdom, but She-Sun, the Land of the Morning Calm. It is part of Japan, having just been annexed by that country. The emperor becomes Prince Gi and will rank lower than the Japanese crown prince. The civil list will not be curtailed, and there will be more money for the court to spend, as there will be fewer retainers. Morning calm will be succeeded by evening calm where once Korea was, and another ancient nation has been smothered out of existence.

Japan by the formal annexation of the Hermit Kingdom has at last really grasped the rich prize toward which all her efforts have been directed for twenty years, to gain which she fought China and dared to measure arms with the mighty empire of the czar, expending in the long struggle hundreds of millions of dollars and the lives of countless thousands of her subjects. Slowly, but with grim relentlessness, the acts of the drama have been evolved, succeeding one another with the inevitableness of the scenes in a Greek tragedy. The minds at Tokyo which conceived the plot two decades ago knew what the denouement was to be. When Japan first cast covetous eyes on Korea—valuable on account of its intrinsic mineral wealth, but still more on account of its strategical position on the mainland of Asia—China was regarded as possessing suzerainty over that kingdom. Japan soon found a pretext for alleging that China was causing an unfriendly feeling in Korea against the mikado's government. The usual negotiations were but a prelude to war, the first act in the modern drama of the far east.

China as a result of the war lost all right of interference in the affairs of Korea. But the exit of China proved to be merely the entry of Russia on the stage. Japan saw clearly that Russia's line of expansion would lie toward the Pacific through Manchuria. She saw that Russia's eyes were bent on Korea, and she resolved to be first in the field and place herself as guardian at the Pacific gateway of Manchuria.

Japan's plan seemed to have succeeded when the intervention of the powers in 1895 barred her progress and installed Russia in Liaotung. Thenceforward Japan had but one idea—Russia must be dislodged from Korea.

Matters came to a head toward the close of the year 1903. Japan demanded that Russia withdraw her troops from Manchuria. Russia declined, and long negotiations followed, in the course of which Japan offered to efface herself entirely in Manchuria if Russia would do the same in Korea. An ultimatum from Tokyo having failed to bring a reply from the St. Petersburg government, the mikado's naval forces entered the harbor of Chemulpo and fired on and disabled two of the czar's warships. The war was on, and the result is history.

On Nov. 17, 1905, the emperor of Korea was practically forced by Prince (then Marquis) Ito, the mikado's special envoy at Seoul, to agree to a new pact. Korea's independence then became practically nonexistent. Nothing but a shadow of her national sovereignty remained. The emperor became practically a vassal of the mikado. Marquis Ito was installed as resident general at Seoul, and his subordinates ruled the destinies of the old kingdom. The following year, by a new agreement, the emperor recognized the residency general. Within a year he abdicated in favor of his son, who was sent to Tokyo to be educated in Japanese surroundings. By an agreement signed July 31, 1907, all administrative measures and the appointment of all high officials became subject to the resident general. Finally in July, 1909, Japan seized control of the administration of justice and prisons. The national government of Korea was no more.
