ments and towers to ward away the hostile hosts—girt round with rugged mountains the valley lies. Close nestling 'neath the shadow of the hills grow thriving towns. Far to the east misty vapors mark the home of boiling springs and thither come the suffering ones of earth to dip beneath their magic waters and be healed.

Stretching far beneath the mountain slopes lie level lands that yield with easy grace their harvests rich. Broad fields of wheat now waving 'neath the summer skies like emerald seas that later change to gold. Great fields of beets which soon through cruel bruising yield their wealth of sweetness to the needs of man. And orchards vast—in spring time all a bloom, then bending 'neath a load of ripening fruit.

Not only fruitful is this beautiful vale but fair—exceeding fair to look upon throughout the changing seasons of the passing years. When winter clothes the hills in snow, like sentinels grim the mountains stand—now glistening in the sunlight's glow then wrapped in drapery of mist and cloud. Spring—joyous spring arrives. She throws upon the mountain slopes a carpet green all strewn with flowers of varied hues. Song birds arrive and all the land is glad.

Through long bright summer days the mountain sides assume far richer, deeper hues. Then as the sunlight sinuous creeps from place to place along those furrowed walls by its soft warm caress it seems to draw from the secret chambers of the mountain's heart the gleam of gold and precious gems that through past ages have lain unnoticed there.

Now down the western sky Sol's golden chariot glides to meet the hills that lift the fr heads in majesty sublime. The waiting fleecy clouds catch all the glancing sunbeams bright and hold them prisoners close 'till in their bosoms burn the same bright fire that grows within the opal's heart. A long bright rosy shaft escapes and rests in wanton glow in yon high peaks that mark the northern limit of the valley's broad expanse and lingers there. Slow fades those bright prismatic hues 'till all the land is mellow with the golden glow that merges into twilight's dusky shadows. As one by one the night lamps in the sky begin to burn and Luna's shining face fills all the land with silvery light, in ecstasy the soul exclaims: "How great is man

that Thou art mindful of him amidst the marvelous splendors of the created world."
