REGAL POMP DISGUSTING

to Holland, then to Germany, then to Switzerland, France and Scotland and then home on the steamer Arable, landing in New York in time to catch the terrible heat there a few days.

"Three weeks ago today I and my family stood on the pinnacles of the Alps, clad in winter clothing, looking down on the most wonderful sights that man's eyes can see. Yet here we are, home again, completing the last lap of an 18,000 mile journey.

"It was while Germany, especially along the historical Rhine, and while in the mountains of Switzerland, that the social problem of England struck me so to speak.

Just out of that poverty stricken, royally ridden district of England where vast estates owned by men who inherit them and didn't earn them, lay idle except to furnish amusement for the rich, and where the poor man is not aiding in the productiveness of the soil for someone's good, I could commence to appreciate the wonderful effort on the continent to utilize every inch of land. They do utilize the soil there and the result was that on my entire trip on the continent I was not accosted by a single beggar. In the Alps we saw soil, producing food-stuffs, that resembled in every way the rocky road between here and Perry. Wherever there is a foot of land without a rock, you will find something of usefulness growing. The natives are well clad, happy, intelligent and comfortable. The panacea for the labor problem there is to give employment and not take away. There is a man for everything and the railroads are manned with capacity crews. While the natives devote their time to utilizing the soil the non-farming element is working at something else. It is true all over the continent.

Why Alps Are Pretty.

"The chief reason why the Alps are so beautiful is that wherever there isn't snow, that is, farther down the steep slopes, there are frequent spots where there are no trees. It is the oak that grows most prolific in Switzerland, the big monarch of the forest. Where one of these open places are found, be it ever so small, you will find a family tilling the soil, packing necessities up the steep hills to the place of abode. To stand on the pinnicles and look down on the natural scenes of beauty, to go where man has lured the tourist to elegant hotels, over hazardous cog railroads to points of prominence—all these things go to make the continental trip one of par excellence."

Suffering in New York during the hot weather was made painfully realistic when Mr. and Mrs. Stoddard reached the metropolis, still fresh and comfortable from visits to the Alpians and a pleasant voyage across the "pond." The change was sudden, however, and on the day that five New Yorkers died and many horses dropped dead from the terrible humidity, Mr. and Mrs. Stoddard were kept at their rooms, suffering with suffocation and alleviating some of the difficulty of breathing by constant use of a fan.

On their return they passed through Chicago and St. Paul, coming by way of the Dakotas and Spokane. The Dakotas, by the way, have fairly good crops; Montana is somewhat dried up, but the last stage of their long journey was resplendent with bumper grain crops. Mr. Stoddard affirming that the Eastern Washington-Oregon fields are finer than he has ever seen them, and though he had seen the beauties of the old countries, and marveled at the many sights of world prominence, nothing was quite so good as to see the Pacific northwest and La Grande once more, "I enjoy being able to talk and not make signs," said Mr. Stoddard. "In fact I still find myself running off a lingo on my fingers, having not forgotten the tricks learned by weeks in strange lands where I couldn't read a sign, or a newspaper, or find anyone to talk to that understood verbal conversation."
