INFERNO FILM IS COSTLY

WILD BEASTS, SERPENTS AND OTHER ELEMENTS COSTLY

Taking of Pictures Entailed Terrible Dangers to the Artists.

The coming of Dante Alighieri's "Inferno" in film form to the Arcade theatre next Saturday and Sunday will show a marvelous piece of picturedom.

When the idea of reproducing the story Dante's "Inferno" was first suggested it met with a storm of objections and criticisms. It was pointed out that such a task would cost enormous sums of money, that there were only half a dozen artists living to whom the principal parts in the production could be safely entrusted, that many of the scenes in Dante's "Inferno" required animals, such as a panther, a lion, a wolf, serpents, etc., that it would be impossible to show in pictures the difficulties of the descending from one pit into another and that such things as frozen lakes, ponds of boiling pitch, or such images as that of Cerberus, or the demons, or the giants, or Lucifer, were utterly beyond the possibilities of human art. Nevertheless, the small band of artists who were inspired by a wish to bring the charms and beauties of Dante home to the great masses, undertook the work and kept at it with a patience and perseverance which could not be discouraged. After many failures and after months had been spent in this endeavor two or three scenes were at last successfully filmed. These scenes were among the hardest in the entire book and they were shown to the most prominent Dante societies throughout Europe and to most of Europe's leading Dante societies. The doubters were soon changed into enthusiastic helpers and the office and studio of the Milano-Films company became a center for painters, sculptors, musicians, scholars, poets and authors, all lending an eager hand to the completion of the work so courageously begun.

Though it is not the policy of the People's Amusement company to exact higher charges for special features, the privilege of using "Inferno" in Oregon has cost huge sums and Manager George has been instructed to charge 25 cents for the performance here.

PEARE STORE IS MADE LARGER

OPTICAL DEPARTMENT EQUIPPED WITH NEW MACHINES

Store Building Larger, Eye Department Made Up to Date.

Extensive renovation, rebuilding and enlargement looking toward better facilities for show room space and adequate room for the new optical department have been made by J. H. Peare jewelry store.

The store has been made larger by extending the rear walls farther back and moreover, the optical department has been fitted up with new equipment of the latest type, and the room for the appliances made larger. Skylights give ample light in the store proper and the optical department.

With Willie Peare, who recently passed the state examination for opticians, in charge, this department is to be specialized upon. Not only have needed instruments and equipment been purchased but the very best of their kinds have been installed and the department is now ready to grind lenses and fit glasses in the most difficult cases.

John Gardner was down on his luck. He had been well born and well educated. Then one misfortune after another came upon him and the family to which he belonged just as he was ready to make a start in life and threw him, so to speak, on his beam ends. He went about applying for a position, but since he had had no experience in any department of business he received no better offer than to solicit orders for a patent gas burner.

Gardner, who had not yet worn out his good clothes and was afraid of meeting some of his old friends who would know what he was doing, kept his samples down in the bottom of his pocket. He had sufficient pluck, however, to drag himself from one house to another, and whenever he was received by any one whom he was sure he had never seen before would produce a gas burner and proceed to expatiate on what a wonderful light it would make and how little gas would be burned.

One morning he rang the bell of a residence, and the door was opened by a young girl. He didn't mind soliciting of old women, of men or servants, but girls troubled him. He was about to ask if some one he was trying to find lived there, but changed his mind, concluding that as short a way as any to make an excuse to go on would be to produce a sample. The girl would say she had no use for it and that would end the matter.

"I am canvassing for a patent gas burner," he began, when the girl, much to his surprise, said, "Step inside." He did so, and she led the way to a drawing room. Then, asking him to be seated, she waited for him to proceed with his harangue. There was nothing left for him but to do so.

"This gas burner," he said, "is arranged to separate the gas into minute streams, so that it will mingle freely with the oxygen of the air, producing a brilliant light and consuming a minimum of gas. Instead of the enormous gas bills run up by using the ordinary form of burner, the consumer finds himself or herself indebted to the company for a bagatelle."

"Are you quite sure," interrupted the girl, "that the company will not at the end of the month be indebted to the consumer?"

Gardner looked at her with a constrained smile, but, seeing no sign of pleasantry and scarcely knowing what he was saying, staggered on.

"We scarcely claim that for it, but we are willing to guarantee that the monthly gas bills will be reduced by 50 per cent of what they are when the ordinary burner is used."

"At what price do you sell your burners?"

"At 10 cents each."

"I will take a hundred of them. I suppose you will put them on for me."

"Large orders like that are usually put on by some one from the factory."

"I am opposed to allowing Tom, Dick and Harry the freedom of the house. I shall expect you to put them on yourself."

"Certainly, if you wish it. Will tomorrow at this hour be convenient for you?"

"Yes."

Gardner bowed himself out, astonished. The most that was required of him was to introduce the burner. It
