DURBAR

other side of the thrones, the king's bodyguard of bluecoated gunners of the Royal Marine artillery stood stiffly at attention; while the Seaforth Highlanders, in scarlet tunics and kilts, and the green-coated rifles formed a guard of honor around the flagstaff on which the royal standard was hoisted later.

Twenty-four stalwart trumpeters, blazing in crimson and gold, advanced to the feet of the dais, and sounded a fanfare on their silver trumpets. Then Brigadier General Dayton, appointed "Delhi herald of arms extraordinary" for the occasion, stepped forward in all his glory of heraldic tabard and trappings, and amid dead silence read the king's imperial proclamation. At the conclusion of his task he swung his plumed hat in the air and called for cheers for the king-emperor, and while the troops came to the royal salute, the "lions and leopards of England"—the royal standard—was unfurled and the artillery fired a salute of 101 guns.

The king then read a short speech which was promptly translated into Hindustani by an alert interpreter and after another fanfare the native rulers advanced to render their homage. The Nizam of Hyderabad, as premier prince and ruler of the premier Mohammedan power of India, advanced first to take the oath of allegiance, and then in succession came the rulers of the great feudatory states of Baroda, Mysore, Kashmir, Patiala, Jaipur, Travancore, Benares and many more. The Gaekwar of Baroda was the center of attention in the first group, and European beholders gasped with amazement at the amount of jewels he wore. Reliable estimates of the value of the gems sported by this powerful Mahratta chieftain place the figure at one million dollars. The others wore huge fortunes on their persons, in the way of coronets, jeweled collars, sword belts, etc.

One woman did homage to the British monarch—the Begum of Bhopal, who wore the emblem of sovereignty over her purdah veil. Pathans, Sikhs, Shans from far distant Burma, Baluchis, Mohammedans, Buddhists, and Parsis, worshippers of Vishnu, Kail and Krishna, followed each other past the throne in their order until the full total of 150 rulers had been reached. Then, after more fanfares, the king and queen made their way to the raised platform within view of the vast throng assembled in the outer amphitheatre. Here the royal proclamation was read again and the royal couple stood forward to receive the cheers of their native subjects. Amid more booming of artillery, the procession back to the camp was formed and the great Durbar was over. Tonight there will be a state banquet and a reception of the chief native rulers.

Simultaneously with the reading of the proclamation at Delhi, copies were read in every town and village of India. The Durbar is being observed as a public holiday, and tonight there will be illuminations, fireworks, feasting and junketing on an enormous scale. All public buildings display a picture of the king-emperor, and a big bid for popularity has been made in the way of free meals to the poor and presents for the children. Military reviews were held and salutes were fired in every garrison town in India. If history records the Woigast-Welsh battle it will have to be in an appendix.
