CONCRETE STREET IN CHICAGO.

The Chicago Portland Cement Co., through their advertising manager, Robert Crawford, issued a bulletin recently, which contained a reproduction of a photograph of Emerald avenue from Seventy-third to Seventy-fifth streets, Chicago, which was paved with concrete, using their cement. Speaking of this pavement in their publication, they say: "This pavement is representative of this type and from the illustration it will be seen to be still in good condition after three years of use. The ground was excavated to a depth of eight inches and on the natural sand base was placed, in blocks measuring 8-30 feet, a layer of concrete 6 inches thick, mixed in the proportion of one part cement, three parts torpedo sand and six parts crushed stone. On top of this a layer 2 inches thick, mixed in the proportion of two parts cement to one and one-half parts torpedo sand and one and one-half parts crushed granite, corrugated in brick fashion, 4 1/2 x 9 inches, provides the wearing surface.

"The cost of laying this pavement was comparatively low—$1.50 per square yard—when it is considered that the following prices were paid for material and labor:

- Cement, per barrel$1.30
- Torpedo sand, per cubic yard ... 1.60
- Crushed stone, per cubic yard... 1.50
- Crushed granite, per cubic yard . 2.75
- Common labor, per day (8 hours) 3.00

"The particular advantages of concrete as a paving material are amply demonstrated in this particular piece of work. Besides its sanitary and wearing features, this pavement is less slippery than brick and residents in the neighborhood maintain that it is noiseless. Its near approach to the ideal pavement brings contractors, engineers and others interested in highway construction to inspect it annually, and so popular has it become locally that there is a strong demand for similar paving in other parts of the city. The Illinois Portland Cement Paving company of Chicago were the contractors."

Almost Lost His Life.
