al paralysis and financial disaster. These manifestations have, however, been confined to democratic revisions. The old policy has been discarded and through the efforts of President Taft a tariff board this is destined to inaugurate a new system in the making of tariff laws has been created.

"In 1908 the republican platform laid down the rules for tariff revision that the rates of duty should measure the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad. In order to intelligently apply this rule the cost of production of articles in all competing nations must be ascertained. Heretofore congress has had inadequate means of obtaining this information and this is the function of the tariff board which President Taft has created. To Mr. Taft is due the credit of providing the law-making body for the first time in history with adequate facilities of obtaining this information." How President Roosevelt brought Governor Taft from the Philippines to take charge of the construction of the Panama canal, and how he had been prominently identified with that work continuously since were eloquently portrayed. His work in securing for San Francisco the 1915 exposition was referred to and some inside congressional history given, showing that without the influence of the presidential office New Orleans would have won the enterprise for the Gulf of Mexico, instead of the Pacific ocean having it.

The speaker concluded amidst a round of applause in a masterly tribute to President Taft.

preme court of the United States, distinguished officers of the navy and the army, as well as a large concourse of citizens, were present. Thousands of bluejackets of the navy, United States marines, soldiers of the regular army and of the National Guard and delegations representing patriotic and other civic organizations were assembled in parade as a tribute to the famous naval hero.

The memorial, the work of Paul H. Niehus, the New York sculptor, was admired by everyone who saw it. In many respects it differs from other similar memorials erected in the national capital. It consists of a marble pylon of classic design as the background for a colossal bronze figure of the intrepid naval commander of the early days of the republic. The pylon is a massive rectangular tower about 15 feet in height. It occupies the center of an ornamental fountain, the water for which will come from the bronze heads of dolphins at each end of the pylon. On the back of the shaft is a large panel containing a bas relief representation of Commodore Jones raising the American flag on the historic ship Bonhomme Richard.

The Jones statue stands at the base of the monument in front of the pedestal. It is of heroic proportions, being about ten feet high. The great naval commander is shown in full uniform, with an expression and pose suggestive of his indomitable will and unconquerable spirit. Apparently he is watching a naval engagement. His right hand is clenched and his left hand clutches his sword.

In the die under the statue is inscribed:

1747 First 1793 To compel foreign men of war To strike colors to the Stars and Stripes.

There are two inscriptions on the rear of the pylon. The first of these
