DRIED PRUNES NOT WANTED

BUYING IS SLOW ON THE PACIFIC COAST

Big Crop in California Has Tendency of Hurting Price.

(Oregon Journal.)

Unable to interest the Eastern or foreign trade in coast prunes at this time, leave the market in a stagnant position, from which local interests have been unable to move it.

There is no demand at all for dried prunes from the east just now, although several weeks ago fair stocks could be moved at low prices. The demand was much more limited than the trade had anticipated, and after the first orders were filled, dryers were unable to interest other buyers or get former purchasers to take additional supplies.

The big crop of prunes in California this season, together with the bumping the trade received last season, have not been features to encourage extensive buying this year. Prunes reached such an enormous height in 1911 that the general public was compelled to do without them and has forgotten them since. As a rule, the trade here is able to swing quite liberal foreign business each season but this year the prune crop was very good abroad, therefore making very little demand for the American product.
