MARTIN WILL SPEAK AGAIN

SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS ESPECIALLY INVITED.

E. R. Martin, S. S. Union Leader, Speaks Tonight.

Following an enthusiastic "get-together" meeting at the Baptist church last evening at which plans were formulated for a canvass for funds preliminary to calling a pastor arrangements were made for a rally in interest of Sunday school and Young People's work at which Mr. Martin of Portland, who has been in the city for a few days past, will speak on "The More Important Conservation." This lecture has been delivered at numerous important gatherings on the coast and the people of La Grande are specially favored in having an opportunity to hear this address at this time.

A general and cordial invitation is extended to all interested to attend. At the Baptist church at 7:30 this (Friday) evening.

No admission charged or collection taken.

at their convention at Atlantic City out up Eugene W. Chafin of Illinois and Aaron S. Watkins of Ohio for vice president.

This year of 1912 has seen such a sundering of political ties as does not often occur in America, but it is all referable to so-called "progressivism" just as slavery was responsible for the diverse tickets in 1860 and the monetary question for the splitup of the Democratic party in 1906.

The Democrats this year present a more united front than for many years past. Though the campaign that preceded the Baltimore convention was an exceedingly spirited one, it apparently left no bitterness for the restoration of harmony was almost instantaneous. Within a week after the delegates adjourned at Baltimore the several factions had come together with the single purpose of electing the national ticket. The unsuccessful opponents of Wilson at Baltimore took to the stump in his behalf and the Bryanites and anti-Bryanites of the olden days have repeatedly spoken from the same platform during the campaign that is just closing.

The Republican party, on the other hand, has found itself divided for the first time since the civil war. The "insurgents" who bolted the Republican national convention at Chicago after the renomination of President Taft met in the same city a few weeks later and formed the Progressive party. Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, who had fought vainly to secure the "regular" Republican nomination, was named for president and Governor Johnson of California was selected as his running mate.

The situation on the Republican side then became complicated by the fact that the political affiliations of the electors in many of the states were in doubt, being claimed by both the Taft and Roosevelt factions. The electoral controversies were finally settled in a manner more or less satisfactory to both sides, though new and more serious perplexities may result from the same source in case the balloting is close next Tuesday.

A court decision has left Taft without representation on the electoral ticket in California where the Roosevelt electors appear as Republicans. In Oklahoma the two Roosevelt electors appearing on the Republican ticket have agreed to vote for Taft if he carries the state. A similar agreement has been reached in Oregon. In South Dakota and Nebraska the Taft electors appear on the ballot by petition. In the other states where controversies existed the original Roosevelt electors have been replaced on the Republican ballot by Taft supporters.

The next electoral college will be composed of 531 members, and the successful candidates for president and vice president must secure a total of at least 265 to be elected. With three leading tickets in the field, instead of two as in former presidential campaigns of late years, it is easily within the range of possibilities that none of the three might secure a sufficient electoral vote and that the election of the next president and vice president would devolve upon the national house of representatives. There will be 435 representatives in the next congress, all of whom will be elected on Tuesday except the few in Maine and Vermont, which states held early elections.
